PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 86th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1959

(Legislative day of Monday, August 31, 1959)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and blessed God, in the midst of toiling days when the fever and fret of perilous times take their toll of bodies and spirits, we are grateful for quiet arbors of peace where, at an altar of contrition, we may bow for Thy forgiveness and cleansing.

Without Thee, our striving would be losing, for our strength is unequal to our tasks.

To Thy servants in this Chamber of Governance has been given, in Thy providence, and because of the people's trust, a place of awesome responsibility in this supreme hour of history. May they exercise with anxious care and deep humility that stewardship of power.

Help us here to consecrate ourselves anew to the fulfillment of the aims and dreams of a new world of justice and equality for which America's sons died on the battlefields of the world.

Send us forth to serve the present age in the triumphant certainty that though willful men imagine a vain thing, and though the earth were removed and the mountains cast into the midst of the sea, the Lord of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, August 31, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is in order, under the 3-minute limitation ordered on yesterday.

REPORT OF AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the president and editor of proceedings, the convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the proceedings of the 39th meeting of that organization, held in Colorado Springs, Colo., June 28, 1959, through July 3, 1959, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment:

H.R. 7225. An act for the relief of Sylvester L. Gardner (Rept. No. 855).

By Mr. ERVIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

H.R. 8461. An act to amend the act of September 2, 1958, establishing a Commission and Advisory Committee on International Rules of Judicial Procedure (Rept. No. 856).

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

H.R. 1735. An act to provide for conveyance of certain real property of the United States in Yalobusha County, Miss., to W. A. Nolen and Wiley W. Walker (Rept. No. 858);

H.R. 4714. An act to quiet title and possession with respect to certain real property adjacent to the Rocky Mountain Arsenal, Denver, Colo. (Rept. No. 857);

H.R. 5892. An act to provide for the establishment of Minute Man National Historical Park in Massachusetts, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 860); and

H.R. 6781. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain additional property to be included within the Independence National Historical Park (Rept. No. 859).

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with an amendment:

S. 2565. A bill to amend the act of August 9, 1955 (69 Stat. 539), relating to leases of Indian lands (Rept. No. 861).

By Mr. KUCHEL, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

H.R. 8587. An act to provide for the equalization of allotments on the Agua Caliente (Palm Springs) Reservation in California, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 866).

By Mr. DWORSHAK, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with an amendment:

S. 2379. A bill to donate to the Nez Perce Tribe of Idaho approximately 11.25 acres of Federal land in Idaho County, Idaho (Rept. No. 867).

By Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

H.R. 839. An act to approve an order of the Secretary of the Interior adjusting, deferring, and canceling certain irrigation charges against non-Indian-owned lands under the Wapato Indian irrigation project, Washington, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 868).

By Mr. NEUBERGER, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

S. 2085. A bill to authorize the use of funds arising from a judgment in favor of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 864); and

S. 2485. A bill to authorize the sale of 40 acres of land owned by the Creek Tribe of Indians (Rept. No. 862).

By Mr. NEUBERGER, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with an amendment:

S. 2596. A bill to provide for the division of the tribal assets of the Catawba Indian Tribe of South Carolina among the members of the tribe, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 863).

By Mr. NEUBERGER, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with amendments:

S. 1352. A bill to authorize enrolled members of the Three Affiliated Tribes of the Fort Berthold Reservation, N. Dak., to acquire trust interests in tribal lands of the reservation, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 865).

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, with amendments:

S. 2568. A bill to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, with respect to cooperation with States (Rept. No. 870); and

S. 2569. A bill to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (Rept. No. 871).

PAYMENT IN LIEU OF TAXES—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, from the Committee on Government Operations, I report favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 910) to authorize the payment to local governments of sums in lieu of taxes and special assessments with respect to certain Federal real property, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 869) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed, together with the minority views of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota; and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I understand that the able Senator has placed on the desk the report on S. 910, the in lieu tax bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes. I filed it for the committee, and may I add that it is cosponsored by my good friend, the deputy leader and the minority whip, who has been a tower of strength in getting this bill through the committee and to the Senate. I am honored to be with him on the bill.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank my friend. I ask consent that these comments may appear in the same position as those made by the able Senator at the time he submitted the report on the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I congratulate my friend, the able Senator from Minnesota, in bringing to the floor a bill that has no partisanship in it whatsoever, the so-called in lieu tax bill which has been before Congress for many years and for which he and I and Democrats and Republicans of bygone Congresses have stood together.

I do hope very much, Mr. President, that we can have S. 910 set down for debate here prior to the adjournment sine die of this Congress, because local government in America, the cities and counties of our Nation, particularly those areas where the real property holdings are largely owned by the U.S. Government, which, of course, pays no local taxes, will welcome the news that Congress is on its way to debating—and, I hope, approving—legislation in this field which is certainly long overdue.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Harry F. Stimpson, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Paraguay;

Henry Cabot Lodge, James G. Fulton, Clement J. Zablocki, Walter S. Robertson, and George Meany, to be representatives to the 14th session of the General Assembly of the United Nations; and Virgil M. Hancher, Charles W. Anderson, Erle Cocke, Jr., Mrs. Oswald B. Lord, and Harold Riegelman, to be alternate representatives to the 14th session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Carl A. Weinman, of Ohio, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Ohio.

By Mr. CARROLL, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Walter A. Gordon, of California, to be judge of the District Court for the Virgin Islands.

By Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

J. Smith Henley, of Arkansas, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern and western districts of Arkansas; and

Gordon E. Young, of Arkansas, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Arkansas.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. EASTLAND:

S. 2627. A bill for the relief of Nicholas Anthony Marcantonakis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BARTLETT (for himself and Mr. GRUENING):

S. 2628. A bill to establish the U.S. Study Commission on the Development of the Rivers, Ports, and Drainage Basins (and intervening areas) of the State of Alaska; to the Committee on Public Works.

(See the remarks of Mr. BARTLETT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 2629. A bill for the relief of Clifford J. Benson; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PARTICIPATION BY FEDERAL AGENCIES IN FIFTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON HIGH-SPEED PHOTOGRAPHY

Mr. MAGNUSON submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 75); which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Whereas photographic techniques which can magnify the time scale of scientific phenomena are extremely important to the research and engineering activities of every nation; and

Whereas the First International Congress on High-Speed Photography was held in Washington, District of Columbia, in 1952, having been organized and conducted under the sponsorship of the Society of Motion Picture and Television Engineers; and

Whereas subsequent meetings were held at two-year intervals in Paris, France; London, England; and Cologne, Germany; and in each instance these meetings have received the recognition and the support of the governments of the respective host countries; and

Whereas, with each meeting, the International Congress on High-Speed Photography has grown in stature and in prestige; and

Whereas the Society of Motion Picture and Television Engineers is once again sponsoring the International Congress on High-Speed Photography in Washington, District of Columbia (this fifth congress will be held in October 1960); and

Whereas the Congress is fully appreciative of the importance of assuring that this international scientific meeting is conducted in a manner which will bring credit and enhanced prestige to the United States of America as the host nation; and

Whereas it is the belief of the Congress that—

(1) the democratic environment of the free world is the best environment for achievement in science; and

(2) scientists and engineers have special advantages and opportunities to assist in achieving international understanding since the laws and concepts of science cross all national and ideological boundaries; and

Whereas the Congress is interested in (1) promoting international understanding and good will; (2) enhancing the excellence of American science, both basic and applied; and (3) furthering international cooperation in science and technology by creating the necessary climate for effective interchange of ideas: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that all interested agencies of the Federal Government should participate actively to the greatest practicable extent in the Fifth International Congress on High-Speed Photography to be held in Washington, District of Columbia, in October 1960 under the sponsorship of the Society of Motion Picture and Television Engineers.

THREE-YEAR LIMITATION ON REPAYMENTS OF DISASTER LOANS TO FARMERS AND STOCKMEN

Mr. HUMPHREY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 185); which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that a maximum repayment period of not less than three years should be authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to disaster loans made to farmers and stockmen under the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of section 2 of the Act of April 6, 1949 (63 Stat. 43; 12 U.S.C. 1148a–2).

STUDY COMMISSION ON DEVELOPMENT OF RIVERS, PORTS, AND DRAINAGE BASINS, ALASKA

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish the U.S. Study Commission on the Development of the Rivers, Ports, and Drainage Basins (and Intervening Areas) of the State of Alaska.

This bill, Mr. President, would establish a study commission modeled after similar commissions which have been of great assistance to the executive department, the Congress and the regions of the United States which these previous commissions have studied. Now that Alaska is a State, it is appropriate that representatives of Federal departments selected by the President and resident Alaskans selected by the Governor of Alaska work in common effort to formulate a comprehensive and coordinated program for the utilization of Alaska's water resources in the public interest. In Alaska we have a great need for the information which such a commission could provide. Our great rivers can be put to work for navigation, power, recreation, irrigation, and other beneficial purposes.

Mr. President, under my proposal, the U.S. Study Commission established thereunder would submit a report to the President of the United States containing its recommendations for the development of the water and land resources of the State of Alaska. This report would be submitted after thorough study by the Commission itself, after consultation with Federal departments and agencies concerned and with the Governor of Alaska, and would be accompanied by the views, comments, and recommendations of the Governor and the interested Federal departments and agencies.

The President would transmit the Commission's report to Congress, together with his views and recommendations.

Mr. President, this proposed legislation is an expression of the desire of Alaskans to participate in the thoughtful and careful study processes which will make possible an ever greater contribution by Alaska to the well-being of the Nation, and which will insure that governmental efforts to develop rivers, ports, and drainage basins in Alaska on a comprehensive basis will be preceded by sound research by knowledgeable persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2628) to establish the U.S. Study Commission on the Development of the Rivers, Ports, and Drainage Basins (and Intervening Areas) of the State of Alaska, introduced by Mr. BARTLETT (for himself, and Mr. GRUENING), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF TAXES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MUNDT submitted amendments, in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 910) to authorize the payment to local governments of sums in lieu of taxes and special assessments with respect to certain Federal real property, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXTENSION OF AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1954—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HUMPHREY submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 1748) to extend the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO—AMENDMENT

Mr. PROXMIRE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PROXMIRE also submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to House bill 1, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

LIBERALIZATION OF TARIFF LAWS FOR WORKS OF ART AND OTHER EXHIBITION MATERIAL—BILL PLACED ON CALENDAR

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, on August 26, 1959, the Senate received a message from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had passed the bill (H.R. 6249) to liberalize the tariff laws for works of art and other exhibition material, and for other purposes. Since that time, the bill has remained at the desk. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken from the desk and placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (H.R. 6249) to liberalize the tariff laws for works of art and other exhibition materials, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and placed on the calendar.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. RANDOLPH:

Extracts from an address delivered by him on the occasion of the dedication of the Berkeley County War Memorial Park, near Martinsburg, W. Va., Saturday, August 29, 1959.

By Mr. McCARTHY:

Statement by him entitled "Books and the Cold War," and a letter to him from Mr. Harry Tyson Carter, of the U.S. Information Agency, dated August 13, 1959, on the same subject.

By Mr. BRIDGES:

Editorial entitled "Prayers, Not Cheers," written by Edward Seavey and published in the Hampton Union of August 27, 1959.

By Mr. WILEY:

Text of interview on AFL–CIO broadcast "Washington Reports to the People," on the subject of the forthcoming visit of Premier Khrushchev.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF HENRY A. STEBBINS TO BE AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY TO THE KINGDOM OF NEPAL

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate today received the nomination of Henry F. Stebbins, of Massachusetts, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Kingdom of Nepal.

In accordance with the committee rule, the pending nomination may not be considered prior to the expiration of 6 days.

NOTICE OF POSTPONEMENT ON HEARING OF NOMINATION OF JAMES DURFEE TO BE JUDGE OF THE U.S. COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, notice is hereby given that the public hearing scheduled for 10:30 a.m., Wednesday, September 2, 1959, in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, on the nomination of James Durfee, of Wisconsin, to be judge of the U.S. Court of Claims, vice Benjamin H. Littleton, retired, has been postponed.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF J. JOSEPH SMITH TO BE U.S. CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary I desire to announce that a public hearing has been scheduled on the nomination of J. Joseph Smith, of Connecticut, to be U.S. circuit judge for the second circuit, vice Carroll C. Hincks, retired, for 10:30 a.m. Wednesday, September 9, 1959, in the committee room, room 2226, New Senate Office Building.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as are pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], and myself, as chairman.

PARK SERVICE ANSWERS QUESTIONS ABOUT OREGON DUNES NATIONAL SEASHORE AREA

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, during 1957 and 1958 a Pacific coast recreation area survey conducted by the National Park Service pointed out the national significance of the Oregon Dunes area. Studies later showed that the area contained unique scenic, biological, geological, and recreational attributes.

Due to that survey, the National Park Service recommended the establishment of an Oregon Dunes National Seashore Area which would include the Sea Lion Caves. Of course, congressional approval is needed before the department can begin any concrete measures, such as land acquisition, for the park.

Since agitation for an Oregon Dunes Park began, many interested persons have posed questions concerning a seashore preserve. At my request, the National Park Service has prepared a series of answers to some most thoughtful inquiries submitted by Mr. Ralph Middleton, division manager of the Central Lincoln People's Utility District, in Florence, Oreg.

Mr. President, I ask that this memorandum be included at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, although the National Park Service cannot predetermine Federal policies regarding proposed legislation, its responses to Mr. Middleton's questions are pertinent and illuminating. They are based on the general laws and policies for the administration of the national park system and previous experience which the Park Service has had in establishing national parks.

Mr President, through the preceding weeks, I have been calling attention to the merits of a national seashore area at the Oregon Dunes. However, in all my comments I cannot find a better statement than that included in the National Park Service's memorandum, which I wish to read into the RECORD:

The advantages to the general public would be the preservation intact of this unique area embracing closely related scenic, biological and geological features. The dunes, the Sea Lion Caves, the ocean beach, the forest and the outstanding recreation opportunities offered by the fresh-water lakes, combine to produce an area of national significance. To use its resources by permitting an assortment of unrelated and conflicting uses would gradually reduce its character and benefits to mediocrity. Its preservation, development and operation under a unified and consistent plan for public park purposes would seem to be the logical way to realize its greatest public benefits.

These comprehensive replies from the National Park Service were sent to me by the Honorable Roger Ernst, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I am grateful for his cooperation.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., August 27, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: In our letter to you on August 3 we promised to send you a list of questions and answers relating to establishment of the proposed Oregon Dunes National Seashore. A list of questions had been submitted to you by Mr. Ralph Middleton, division manager of the Central Lincoln People's Utility District on June 24.

This material is now enclosed.

Sincerely yours,

ROGER ERNST,
Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CONCERNING THE PROPOSED OREGON DUNES NATIONAL SEASHORE

(Since the proposal is still under review, the discussion of the questions herein should not be construed as indicative of either approval or disapproval by the Department of the Interior.)

A Pacific coast recreation area survey, conducted by the National Park Service in 1957–58 with donated funds identified the Oregon Dunes area as one of the finest relatively undeveloped natural areas on the Pacific coast. Further studies showed that the area is of national significance because of the unusual combination of science, biological, geological and other recreation values. The proposal to establish an Oregon Dunes National Seashore, including Sea Lion Cave, is under study by the Department of the Interior. The approval of Congress would be required before any Federal seashore acquisition program could proceed.

The studies and the proposal have prompted many pertinent questions about such a seashore preserve: What is a national seashore? How large would this area be? How would the land be acquired? Could property owners continue to enjoy their homes?

Answers to these and many other such important questions follow. Most of the questions were framed by Mr. Ralph Middleton, division manager of the Central Lincoln People's Utility District. The answers are based on the general and specific laws and policies established by the Congress for the administration of the areas of the National Park System. They are based also on the experience and practices of the National Park Service in similar instances over the years. More specific answers will depend on the nature and provisions of whatever legislation the Congress may enact to authorize establishment of national seashores.

Although the answers necessarily cannot constitute an advance commitment by the Federal Government regarding proposed legislation, they are meant to be as helpful, specific, and informative as possible.

Question. What is a national seashore?

Answer. A national seashore is a natural coastal area set aside for the preservation and public enjoyment of its nationally significant scenic, scientific, historic, or recreation values, or a combination of such values.

Question. What is a national park?

Answer. A national park is a spacious land area essentially of primitive or wilderness character which contains scenery and natural wonders so outstanding in quality that its preservation intact has been provided for by its having been designated and set aside by the National Government for the benefit, enjoyment, and inspiration of the people.

Question. What is the difference between the two?

Answer. Essentially they are similar, and both are administered under the general laws and policies which apply to all units of the National Park System, unless the Congress specifies otherwise.

In general, a national park might be larger, might be less modified by man, and might require more stringent application of protective controls to conserve the delicate balance of its natural qualities.

A national seashore is a classification of equal importance and significance, but more descriptive of the special qualities and appropriate uses of a seashore. It is an area capable of sustaining in part, at least, some special public uses, such as possibly the hunting of migratory waterfowl, which would be inappropriate in a national park.

Question. Presuming that private property acquired for a seashore area would be removed from the property tax rolls, what offset provision is made by the Government to the following types of local tax bodies: School districts, port districts, rural fire protection districts, and other miscellaneous tax districts?

Answer. Payments by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to local educational agencies for current operating expenses are authorized by Public Law 874, 81st Congress (20 U.S.C., ch. 13) as amended by Public Law 85–620, enacted August 12, 1958. Section 2 of the law provides for financial assistance to local educational agencies in cases where revenues available from local sources have been reduced by more than 10 percent as a result of the acquisition of real property by the Federal Government. Instructions issued by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare state that "any local educational agency which desires to seek to establish eligibility for Federal assistance should request advice, application forms and instructions from its State department of education."

We know of no general authority for payments to other types of tax bodies in lieu of taxes from lands acquired for national park purposes. However, past experience has indicated that park establishment usually creates increased tourist travel and expenditures, resulting in increased overall tax revenue. Also, as land acquisition progresses, there is a gradual decrease in the need for tax-supported community services within the area as people who sell their properties move outside the area boundaries.

Question. What is the effect to a local tax group where a long-term bonded indebtedness has been incurred and a portion of the taxable property within the district is subsequently removed from support of a bond issue already obligated? For example, where a bond issue for school building construction might yet have 10 to 15 years until maturity.

Answer. Frankly, there is no simple answer to this question. Each case must be individually considered in the light of applicable laws and negotiated to minimize financial hardship. It should be remembered, of course, that several years would be required between project authorization by the Congress, appropriation of funds, and final acquisition of the lands involved. Undeveloped land could be purchased first, with development properties being acquired as sales could be negotiated.

Question. What is the procedure for acquisition of private property desired to be included in a seashore area, including:

1. How is purchase price determined? (a) Assessed value? (b) A percentage of fair market value based on an authoritative and distinterested appraisal of individual ownerships? (c) Full market value, also based on a knowledgeable appraisal?

2. What steps and procedures are followed before the right of condemnation of private property is exercised?

Answer:

1. Subject to the availability of funds, acquisition of private lands is normally conducted through direct negotiation with the landowner based upon fair market value appraisals by qualified non-Federal appraisers.

2. Unless there is a special reason to initiate condemnation procedures, i.e., to clear title or to acquire land for a critically needed public facility or to prevent adverse types of development, every reasonable effort is made to reach amicable agreements with the owners for the acquisition of their property.

Question. Presuming that acquisition of private property would include some existing business installations, what would be the application of the following?

1. Would any of the businesses be allowed to remain?

2. If some are retained, what criteria would be applied to determine which enterprises would be left?

3. Would the owner get first priority to operate the business on a lease or concession basis, or must he bid against others for the right to operate the business he originally developed?

4. If the owner has priority, what is the formula to determine what he would pay as rental, and for how long could he continue to operate?

5. What would be the situation in regard to two churches located within the proposed boundaries?

Answer 1. Generally speaking, it is the policy of the Park Service to permit the development of commercial enterprises within the areas administered by this Service only to the extent that such facilities are necessary and appropriate for the use and enjoyment of the public, yet consistent with the preservation and conservation of the areas. Where adequate accommodations exist or can be developed by private enterprise outside of parks, accommodations are not provided within them. It is possible that some of the existing businesses within the proposed national seashore would be required to serve park visitors and would be continued, probably under concession contracts if such properties were purchased by the Government.

2. First, the criteria for which businesses might be continued in the proposed seashore would be the determination that they are necessary and suitable to public use and enjoyment of the area. Secondly, at the time a master plan for the area is drawn, a determination could then be made as to which of the facilities should remain. Location and condition of existing facilities and quality of services would be factors to be considered.

3. Depending on the pertinent circumstances in any particular case, it seems probable that an original owner, selling his business to the Government, would be in a favorable position to negotiate a mutually satisfactory concession contract. Also, there have been instances where existing facilities have been purchased through a deferred purchase plan which allowed the operator to continue for a specified number of years.

4. Franchise fees for concessions are set through negotiation. There is enclosed a statement on the concession policies of the National Park Service that fully explains this subject. There is also enclosed a statement of general information regarding the granting of concession permits and contracts which, we believe, will furnish you with full information on this subject.

5. If churches are located within the boundaries of a national seashore area, their continuance would generally be compatible with the objectives of the area. However, it is possible that as acquisition of private lands within the park boundary progresses, the need for churches within the area might diminish and their congregations might wish to locate them outside the park. In the long-time view, such course of action would seem logical.

Question. Presuming that acquisition of private land would include dwelling buildings, would the present owners be able to continue residing in them, and if so:

1. What is the formula for determining what price would be paid by the occupant for use of the dwelling after it is acquired by the Government?

2. For how long would the occupant be permitted to remain in possession of the dwelling: (a) For life, or (b) for specified term?

3. Would there be a right of succession to such a dwelling by the former owners and occupant's heirs, such as a widow or children?

4. What would the Government permit the occupant to do in regard to improvements or alterations to the dwelling and/or property?

5. What would the Government require the occupant to do on the property other than the specified rental payments, such as (a) general upkeep? (b) repairs, and to what degree? (c) insurance? (d) other services?

6. In cases where private property was acquired against the will of the private owner in a forced sale, would the seller then be required to pay income or capital gains taxes on the difference between original cost to him of the property and a higher forced sale price, as in the case of property originally purchased perhaps 25 or 30 years ago, and where the sale is for the convenience of the Government?

Answer:

1. The computation of the value of a life estate or life lease is based upon the "expectation of life" of the record owner computed from life insurance tables of mortality. It necessarily will be dependent upon the age and number of the sellers involved. Likewise, the present-day value of the property and a reasonable rental return for the property are involved. Qualified appraisers, such as would be used by the National Park Service, frequently are called upon to compute such life estate or life lease values. The method used, as illustrated below, will give a prospective seller an idea as to the formula followed.

Assume that a male seller, 45 years of age, owns a piece of property worth $20,000. His life expectancy would be 25 years. Where more than one owner is involved an adjustment is made in actuarial tables to reflect a proper period considering their ages. Assume further that a net yearly rent of $600 is determined to be fair for the property of the seller. (Note: Net rent is that amount remaining after maintenance, repairs, taxes, depreciation, and insurance have been paid.) A discount is then applied against future rentals to reduce them to present-day worth. A commonly used table is called the Inwood (compound interest) premise. Reference to this table reflects that the present-day worth of 25 years' occupancy for this owner, discounted at 5 percent for the sake of illustration, equals $8,456.40 as the life interest value. The owner would be paid $11,543.60 cash for his property and could occupy and use it for the remainder of his life regardless of the number of years he might live.

2. An occupant remaining under a life tenancy agreement may remain for life. If the owner so desired it would be possible to make arrangements for a specified period not to exceed his life expectancy span.

3. For property owned by more than one person, the value of the life tenancy is computed on the basis of the age of the youngest party who is in ownership. Thus, if a husband and wife are joint owners and the present-day value is computed with respect to the age of the younger spouse, the life tenancy would continue during the lifetime of the surviving spouse. No right of succession is contemplated with respect to persons not in ownership. To do so would perpetuate private ownership within the park.

4. Major improvements such as new structures would have to be approved by the park superintendent. Minor alterations could be made at the occupant's discretion.

5. The occupant would be expected to do normal maintenance on the property and to have insurance coverage.

6. The tax laws make no exception on capital gains under forced sales. However, if the moneys received from the sale of property are reinvested to replace the sold property, there is no capital gains or income tax levied.

Question. If a seashore area were set up to include the sand dunes, would:

1. The present overall program for dune control to prevent encroachment of the sand on highways, both Government and private lands, lakes, and other properties, be continued as it is now outlined?

2. Would such a program be given the present rate of accomplishment, a decreased, or an accelerated rate of program achievement?

Answer. 1. The area is still under study and no definite plan has yet been formulated with regard to dune stabilization. It would seem certain, though, that vital areas such as highways and developed areas would have to be protected from dune encroachment. The Park Service has carried out extensive dune stabilization work at Cape Hatteras and has a continuing program.

At Cape Hatteras, expenditures for dune stabilization have amounted to about $100,000 a year during the past 3 years. Under the Mission 66 program expenditures amounting to $1,470,000 have been contemplated for erosion control, but studies are continuing on whether the program will need to be expanded. The National Park Service is also cooperating with the State of North Carolina in developing an adequate erosion control program.

2. It is difficult to predict the rate of accomplishment that would be possible in this work until the problem has been studied more thoroughly. Also, the progress of the work would necessarily be governed by the annual appropriation of funds.

Question. Where a considerable portion of land adjacent to both Siuslaw and Umpqua Harbors appears to be in the proposed area, what would be the effect on harbor development of a seashore facility? Would it slow down or accelerate port improvement, and how?

Answer. The Park Service does not foresee that the national seashore area, if established, would have any effect on harbor developments or port improvements.

Question. As recent surveys in the coastal area indicate a firm potential of available industrial water trapped in the sand dunes, could this water be utilized by pumping it to industries whose plants might be located outside the boundaries of any seashore area?

Answer. The Park Service has not investigated the water resources of the proposed area to date, but the Geological Survey made a study of the ground water in the vicinity of Coos Bay, some 20 miles south of the proposed area. The 1956 study report has not yet been edited and released for public distribution.

The report, "Ground Water Resources of the Sand Dunes Area North of Coos Bay, Oreg.," indicates a probable fairly uniform infiltration of about 780 million gallons per year, or an average of 2 million gallons per day, per square mile under the dunes. It would seem, therefore, that water for commercial purposes might be obtained adjacent to the proposed seashore without invading that area. If, however, some development of the water resources became necessary to the economic life of adjacent communities, the Service would be receptive to a reasonable proposal that could be accomplished without significant impairment of the recreation area.

Question. 1. Would existing State and county roads in the area be acquired? And if so, how would they be administered for improvement and maintenance? Would free public usage, both private and commercial, be allowed on these present State and county highways?

2. Would fishing and hunting be allowed in the seashore area? If so, to what extent and under what regulations?

Answer. 1. State highways normally are retained by the State. Major county roads that are required for travel and commerce would normally be retained by the county. However, as the area takes shape, many minor roads might no longer be necessary. All roads used primarily for access to the various features of the proposed area would be built and maintained by the Park Service. Free public use of the present highways, for both private and commercial traffic, would be permitted to continue. It is entirely possible, however, that at some future time highway realinement might be made to minimize commercial and through traffic in the area.

2. Fishing would be permitted in the area as would the shooting of migratory waterfowl, subject to existing State and Federal laws, except in areas of concentrated public use. The Service proposes that it be authorized to enter into an agreement with the State for the continuation of migratory waterflowl hunting in such locations as agreed upon. The National Park Service believes, however, that the hunting of upland game within the national seashore area would not be consistent with the conservation and public use objectives.

Question 1. What improvements and developments would be made in such a seashore area as the one proposed?

2. How many people would be employed in such a seashore area?

3. Presuming such a seashore area were approved, how long would it take to reach its full potential development by the National Park Service?

Answer 1. Since the primary purpose of a national seashore is the preservation of its natural and historic qualities for appropriate public use and enjoyment, the facilities provided should be consistent with the conservation objective and should be only those essential to public enjoyment and protection of the area. Facilities and developments for unrelated activities, which can be performed just as well elsewhere, need not be provided within the national seashore. It would be desirable that all developments within the national seashore be kept to a minimum.

More specifically, the Park Service suggests that only those forms of active recreation facilities need be provided that are associated with the natural outdoor conditions in the area, such as trails for hiking and horseback riding, campgrounds and picnic areas with water and adequate sanitary facilities, fishing, boating and swimming facilities and services, and such access roads as may be required. Interpretive facilities, such as visitor centers, nature trails, and appropriate markers and signs, add to public understanding and enjoyment of the area and are customarily provided by the Government, as well as certain administrative buildings—headquarters, ranger stations, maintenance shop, etc.

2. The Park Service estimates that a staff of approximately 20 Federal employees would be necessary as the proposed development is completed, plus additional seasonal personnel and those needed during construction periods. A much larger work force would be required by the privately owned service industries that would cater to the needs of the visiting public. It is expected that these would be in communities adjacent to the proposed national seashore unless certain ones were found to be essential within it.

3. Progress in development would be dependent upon the rate of annual appropriations by the Congress and upon how those amounts fitted into the overall program of the Park Service. The normal procedure would be for the Service to prepare a development plan and a 10-year development schedule.

Question:

1. Is it true that final boundary authority rests solely with the Secretary of the Interior, and if not, who would make the ultimate boundary decisions?

2. What provisions are built into the procedure necessary to make such an area a reality to assure that people in the areas affected will have a voice in the final decision on boundaries and what is to be done in such an area?

Answer:

1. It is true that the pending bills to authorize establishment of the national seashore provide for the designation of boundaries by the Secretary of the Interior. There is, however, a limitation in the bills of "not to exceed thirty-five thousand acres of land and such adjoining waters and submerged lands as he finds are required for the national seashore."

2. The National Park Service, in recommending boundaries, has always given local people opportunity to express their views on these matters. It recognizes that in any such public venture there must be give and take, insofar as that is consistent with the essential purposes of the venture. In many instances adjustments have been made to avoid hardships. The final decision on establishment, of course, rests with the Congress. Hearings by the Interior and Insular Affairs Committees of Congress provide opportunity for all parties to be heard.

Question: To what extent do the desires and opinions of residents of the affected areas bear weight in the final decision on not only the possible boundaries, but even the creation of such an area?

Answer: The answer to the preceding question applies to this question also.

Question: From the present, what is the maximum time that might elapse before a decision is made as to whether a seashore area would be accomplished and final, definite boundaries set?

Answer: Following enactment of legislation to authorize establishment of the area, it is reasonable to believe that not more than a year should be required to set definite boundaries. It should be remembered, however, that land purchases and other circumstances might make minor boundary changes desirable at some future date within the maximum authorized acreage.

Question. Would the total land needed for maximum seashore area development be acquired at one time, or might a nucleus of desired land be established, with undefined areas to be added at some future time?

Answer. It is unlikely that funds would be available at once to finance acquisition of the entire authorized area. Therefore, acquisition would be concentrated on key sites in the interest of preserving natural values and acquiring administrable units. The acquisition of undeveloped land should probably have the first priority.

Question. What are the sources and amounts of funds deemed necessary at this time by the National Park Service for:

1. Initial and feasibility surveys?

2. Acquisition of property for a proposed seashore area?

3. Improvements, installations and operations of a seashore area?

Answer. There are no funds presently available which are specifically earmarked for this project. The Park Service feels that sufficient initial surveys have already been made to establish the feasibility and desirability of an Oregon Dunes National Seashore should the people of Oregon want it and the Congress see fit to authorize its establishment. Funds for land acquisition might be appropriated by the Congress or donated by interested individuals, organizations, and agencies. Park development and operation funds are appropriated by the Congress annually.

Question. Has the National Park Service made a study of the economic effect that a seashore area would have on this central coastal territory, by city? If so, what are the findings of that study?

Answer. The Service is making a study of the economic effect of the proposed national seashore on the surrounding area and expects that a report will be available early this fall.

Question. What advantages to the general public would a seashore area under operation of the National Park Service have over existing and planned installations and improvements by Federal, State, and county agencies who now all have varying amounts of ownership in the proposed area, and whose control guarantees public access to the resources of the area?

Answer. The advantages to the general public would be the preservation intact of this unique area embracing closely related scenic, biological, and geological features. The dunes, the Sea Lion Caves, the ocean beach, the forest and the outstanding recreation opportunities offered by the fresh-water lakes, combine to produce an area of national significance. To use its resources by permitting an assortment of unrelated and conflicting uses would gradually reduce its character and benefits to mediocrity. Its preservation, development and operation under a unified and consistent plan for public park purposes would seem to be the logical way to realize its greatest public benefits.

THE OREGONIAN CORRECTS DISTORTIONS AND CRITICISM OF BONNEVILLE CORPORATION BILL

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in the August 24 issue of Newsweek magazine, Mr. Raymond Moley contributed an article entitled "A TVA in the Northwest?" The theme of Mr. Moley's article was that our proposed Bonneville Power Corporation bill in reality calls for a facsimile of the Tennessee Valley Administration. Since the publication of the Moley article, quite a few Senators have questioned me regarding its particulars, because the Bonneville Corporation bill (S. 1927) presently pends before the Senate Public Works Committee, where it has been the subject of extensive hearings.

I think I can state flatly that the Moley article is based largely on distortions, misrepresentations, omissions, or half-truths. I regret that a periodical of the caliber of Newsweek has provided a forum for so many misstatements.

On its editorial page of August 30, 1959, the Oregonian, of Portland, published a thoughtful and comprehensive reply to Mr. Moley. The title of the editorial is "Power Bill Distortions." As most Members of the Senate are aware, the Oregonian is no wild-eyed, leftwing newspaper. It is the daily of largest circulation in the Pacific Northwest, if I am not mistaken, and it is definitely Republican in its political orientation.

Having said that, I should like to cite a few of the instances in which the editors of the Oregonian have held up a mirror of facts and evidence with which to reflect the distortions in Mr. Moley's Newsweek article. Mr. Moley's article contained the claim that S. 1927 would "put the private, investor-owned companies out of business."

Of course, as the Oregonian editorial emphasizes, the proposed legislation would make it possible for private utilities to share in the supply of federally generated power on a basis which is far more satisfactory to their interests than the present one. Moreover, Mr. Moley's assertion that the Bonneville Corporation bill would infringe on State water rights is without any substance. One section of the bill specifically recognizes historic State jurisdiction in this field.

Mr. President, I ask consent that the Oregonian editorial of August 30, 1959, entitled "Power Bill Distortions," be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so the Senate may know of the analysis made by the editors of this outstanding newspaper of the criticisms aired by Mr. Moley.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregonian, Portland (Oreg.), Aug. 30, 1959]

POWER BILL DISTORTIONS

Raymond Moley's "Perspective" column in Newsweek magazine August 24 is headlined, "A TVA in the Northwest?" Under that misleading question, he packs an astonishing amount of misinformation into several hundred words about S. 1927, the bill introduced by Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, Democrat, of Oregon, to convert the Bonneville Power Administration into a Federal corporation and allow it to finance new power generation by selling revenue bonds.

Although some private utility spokesmen in the Northwest who oppose Bonneville self-financing have quit likening the corporation proposal to a Columbia Valley Authority, as proposed by New Dealers a decade and more ago, Mr. Moley continues to dwell on this hackneyed and untrue shibboleth. If he has read the bill, he has chosen to disregard the provisions which assure that the Bonneville Power Corporation would have no such authority as TVA.

In brief, BPC and TVA would be alike in these respects: (1) Each would be a Federal corporation. (2) As a result of the President's signature of the TVA self-financing bill the other day, each would be empowered to sell revenue bonds and use its power revenues to build new generation. (3) The budgets and plans of each would be subject to Presidential and congressional review and alteration. (4) Each would be administered by a Board appointed by the President (except that BPC Board members must be residents of the Northwest).

But the differences between TVA and the proposed BPC are so vast and unreconcilable that there would not be even a superficial resemblance in operation.

TVA, most importantly, is the sole supplier of power for a population of more than 5 million persons in an area of 80,000 square miles, and these residents are served exclusively by 151 municipal and rural cooperative systems which buy power at wholesale from TVA's hydroplants and steamplants. No private utilities exist in TVA territory.

But, as Mr. Moley himself pointed out, without noting the distinction, there is neither a Federal power monopoly nor a local public power monopoly in the Pacific Northwest. The Federal system of Columbia Basin dams serves public agencies, private utilities, and industries, to the availability of its power. All private utilities and several of the larger publicly owned utilities, both municipal and PUD, have extensive generation of their own. All utilities with generation are members of the Northwest Power Pool, to the benefit of all. The people in each community or area have the right to decide whether they wish to be served at retail by public or private systems.

Another great difference between TVA and BPC lies in authority over nonpower functions.

Congress gave TVA control over navigation, irrigation, flood control, forest and farm improvements, including manufacture and sale of fertilizers, and many related activities. The centralization of Federal authority there is extreme, although it has helped, not impeded, the growth of private business and agriculture, and has contributed vastly to tax values.

But the Bonneville Power Corporation would be strictly limited to the generation and sale at wholesale of power.

BPC would not, as Mr. Moley charged, be "in full control." It could not, as he charged, "shove" the Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation "out of the picture." BPC would not be authorized by S. 1927 to build any hydroelectric dams. These would be built, as they are now, by either the Army engineers or the Bureau of Reclamation. Each such multiple-purpose project would require the authorization of Congress, as it does now. Joint planning would be required.

The main difference would be that BPC would raise the money needed for the cost of power facilities—generation and transmission to load centers—by selling revenue bonds and reinvesting revenues, instead of depending on congressional appropriations. Congress would continue to appropriate funds for flood control and navigation. Congress would establish the subsidy which would be contributed by BPC to irrigation out of power revenues.

Mr. Moley says the bill would have "the essence of a 'basic account,' another public power objective for a long time." If he means a "basin account," in which a portion of power revenues from all Federal dams in the region would be pooled to help irrigation projects not necessarily supplied with water by such dams, the bill does not provide it. Congress, however, could establish a basin account whether or not Bonneville were incorporated. Public power advocates are not all in favor of it, because it might increase wholesale power costs.

It is not true, as Mr. Moley stated, that BPC would either establish a monopoly in power production or further invade the water rights of the States. One provision now in the bill would give private utilities a better break by modifying the preference clause. A first-draft section giving the Federal corporation a veto over non-Federal applications for power sites was removed. BPC would transmit power to areas of need, but it would not distribute it. Distribution would be limited to local utilities, public or private.

In short, Mr. Moley, the onetime Roosevelt brain truster now far to the right among the extremists, has seriously misrepresented the purposes and the provisions of S. 1927, entitled the "Bonneville Reorganization Act of 1959." He owes it to his readers to study the bill and either document or retract his statements and inferences which appear to have been written strictly from prejudice.

GHOSTS IN THE CONSTITUENCY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I hold in my hands two groups of telegrams which I received on August 17. The first batch of 427 identical telegrams reads as follows:

Laws to help stop crooked people in unions and management are good, but a law that will hurt decent unions like the Griffin-Landrum bill is bad. Please do what you can to see that some changes are made by the Senate conference committee. I would not want my union harmed or its job made more difficult.

The second batch of 362, also identical, reads as follows:

According to the newspapers the pressure is on to get the Senate to approve the Landrum-Griffin bill without change instead of it going to the Senate-House conference where some of its worst features that would harm decent run unions could be turned down. Please help in stopping approval of the House bill without these changes.

Mr. President, on August 21, I sent replies to all of these telegrams. I bring the matter to the attention of the Senate for the reason that, among this group of people, so far about 100 of them have turned out to be ghosts.

I hold in my hand the replies which I sent which have so far been returned by the post office with notations such as "no such street," "unknown," "not at address given," and so forth.

Mr. President, I like to receive mail from my constituents, as I am sure all Senators do. There is no better way to keep in touch with the thoughts of the people back home. Each week, I receive thousands of letters on the many issues which come up; and I keep the letters separated according to the proposed legislation which is mentioned, and then go over the letters again shortly before the various bills come to a vote.

But now I am worried. I have always proceeded on the assumption that each letter had a real person attached to the other end. But now I guess ghosts are writing to me, and that is pretty scary. I wonder whether any of the other Members of this great body, who surely must have seen everything by now, can give me any help and advice on what to do about ghosts in the constituency.

INCREASING RATE OF ILLEGITIMACY

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, it is never easy to face up to unpleasant facts. One which we, in this country, have ignored too long is the mounting rate of illegitimacy which is fast approaching proportions of a national disgrace.

More and more of our respected national publications are giving voice to the swelling public concern over a situation which is getting out of hand and is threatening to destroy the moral fiber of our Nation. Almost every statistical report emphasizes that this is one of the greatest social problems of our times—a problem which is not limited to any one State or region.

According to the best available figures, more than 200,000 children are being born out of wedlock in this country every year—a rate which has more than doubled since 1951. One out of every 50 white births and 1 out of every 5 nonwhite births are now illegitimate. More than 5,000 of those births each year are to mothers who are under 15 years of age.

It is out of the conviction, Mr. President, that this problem can no longer be swept under the national carpet that I have proposed that the Senate Committee on Finance at the next session undertake a thorough study of the relationship between the alarming increase in illegitimacy and Federal policies governing welfare assistance to dependent children.

While I would not presume to advocate any one solution to the problem, I think it is generally agreed that Federal policies with respect to such assistance constitute a major factor in the worsening situation with which the country is faced in this regard. To my mind, the Finance Committee could perform no greater public service than by undertaking such a study; and I am confident that it can be undertaken without jeopardizing in the slightest our Christian and humanitarian obligation to provide for the welfare of unfortunate children.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Members of this Senate will agree with me that such a study is warranted by the facts and would be in the national interest.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed herewith in the RECORD as a portion of my remarks the text of my letter to members of the Senate Committee on Finance setting forth my proposal for such a study, and material dealing with the magnitude of the problem—two memorandums from the Legislative Reference of the Library of Congress, an article from the June 15, 1959, issue of U.S. News & World Report entitled "Illegitimacy—Growing Problem for the Taxpayer," an article from the Wall Street Journal entitled "Welfare Dilemma," an article from the August 30, 1959, issue of the Washington Sunday Star, entitled "Illegitimacy on the Upsurge Throughout the Nation," and an editorial from the Athens (Ga.) Banner-Herald of August 2, 1959, entitled "Illegitimacy Problem Continues To Grow."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF LETTER WRITTEN BY U.S. SENATOR HERMAN E. TALMADGE TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

One of the greatest social problems of our time is the mounting rate of illegitimacy. It is a problem which is not limited to any State or region.

While I would not presume to advocate any one solution to the problem, I think it is generally agreed that the policies of the Federal Government with respect to welfare assistance to dependent children constitute a major factor in the worsening situation with which the country is faced in this regard.

It is my considered opinion that the Senate Committee on Finance could perform a great and much-needed public service by undertaking a thorough study of all facets of the question with a view toward determining and recommending whatever changes may be needed in the law to eliminate any sanction or encouragement of illegitimacy through Federal welfare assistance. I am confident that such a determination could be made without jeopardizing in the least the obligation of the Nation to assist in providing for the welfare of unfortunate children.

I know it is too late for this question to be considered this year, but I am writing at this time in the hope that you will agree with me that the problem should have the committee's attention as soon as possible after the convening of the 2d session of the 86th Congress next January.

For your information I am herewith enclosing thermofax copies of two memorandums on this subject prepared at my request by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress and amplifying articles published recently by the Wall Street Journal and U.S. News & World Report.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., May 20, 1959.

To: Hon. HERMAN E. TALMADGE.
From: Education and Public Welfare Division.
Subject: Current figures on illegitimacy as a factor relating to the aid to dependent children program including rough estimates, by State, of amounts expended on such cases.

The following figures have been assembled in response to your request of May 18, 1959, for information on the above subject and are based on data for 1956, which is the latest period for which this information is available.

The proportion of cases in the aid to dependent children program in which illegitimacy is listed as the cause of dependency has more than doubled between 1951 and 1956. In 1951 illegitimacy was the cause of dependency in only 11 percent of the cases, but by 1956 it had increased to 22.7 percent. To some extent this change in proportion results from the fact that more widowed mothers with children under 18 are receiving less under public assistance, or none at all, as they are qualifying for survivor benefits under the old-age and survivors insurance program because its coverage has been substantially extended beginning in 1951. The aid to dependent children program has thus shifted in emphasis from one designed primarily to aid widowed mothers and their children to one in which family problems are the cause of broken homes, desertion and illegitimacy. For example, in 1951 death or incapacitation was the cause of dependency in 51 percent of the cases, a figure which dropped to 35.1 percent in 1956.

Although no figures are available as to exact amount of money expended on behalf of aid to dependent children cases involving illegitimacy, a very rough idea of the amounts involved can be obtained by applying the 1956 percentage figures for the total cases involved to total expenditures under this program. These figures must, of course, be qualified, especially by the fact that family payments in the program are related to the number of individuals in the family, so that a family of two within the same jurisdiction and under identical circumstances of need would receive less than, say, a family of four or five. Other factors influencing total expenditures are the varying standards of need between States as to the amount of the payments made to each individual under the program, and the varying eligibility requirements. For example, the amounts of payment per individual under this program in February, 1959, ranged from $7.02 for Alabama to $47.96 in Connecticut.

The following figures, then, are presented with the above qualifications:

State	Total annual expenditure in thousands for aid to dependent children	Percentage of cases involving illegitimacy	Amounts expended for aid to dependent children where illegitimacy is cause of need
Alabama	$9,793	23.1	$2,262,183

Subject: Most recent figures on illegitimacy as a factor relating to the aid to dependent children program including rough estimates, by States, of the amounts of Federal money expended on such cases.

The following figures are based on data for 1956, which is the latest period for which this information is available.

The same qualifications apply to this information as to that sent to you May 20, 1959, regarding this general subject. There are no figures available for the amount of Federal money expended on behalf of aid to dependent children cases involving illegitimacy in each State to the Federal grant for that particular State's aid to dependent children program.

These figures must also be qualified by the fact that family payments under the aid to dependent children program are related to the number of individuals in the family, so that a family of two within the same jurisdiction and under identical circumstances of need would receive less than, say, a family of four or five. Other factors influencing total expenditures are the varying standards of need among States as to the amount of payment made to each individual under the program; for example, the amounts of payment per individual under this program in February 1959 ranged from $7.02 in Alabama to $47.96 in Connecticut.

The following figures, then, are presented with the above qualifications:

State	Total annual amount of Federal expenditures in thousands for aid to dependent children	Percentage of cases involving illegitimacy	Amount of Federal money expended annually in thousands for aid to dependent children where illegitimacy is cause of need

ILLEGITIMACY: GROWING PROBLEM FOR THE TAXPAYER

Here's a new complaint by taxpayers: It's costing them $210 million a year to support more than 300,000 illegitimate children.

Drastic remedies are being proposed. But the number of unwed mothers continues to rise.

In city after city, a new problem is causing growing concern to budget-worried officials. This is the problem of financing the care of the sharply rising number of illegitimate children.

Aid to dependent children has become a $1.1-billion-a-year expense for Federal, State and local governments. Of that burden, $210 million will be spent in the next 12 months on aid to children born out of wedlock.

Still other millions will go for free medical care, free nurseries and salaries of social workers to help the unwed mothers and their children.

BIG-CITY TROUBLE

This is largely a big-city problem. Official figures indicate that it is a problem that has grown with migration of Negroes from the South to cities of the North, as shown in the charts on these pages.

The number of babies born out of wedlock in the United States has been increasing both in number and in the proportion of total births. Latest figures compiled by the U.S. Office of Vital Statistics give an estimate of 201,700 illegitimate births in 1957.

Most officials familiar with the situation agree, however, that for a variety of reasons the total of such births is vastly understated. The problem is of such a size and is growing so rapidly, that some drastic remedies are being proposed.

FOR REPEATERS: PENALTIES

In New York City, a grand jury has proposed that aid be denied to mothers of more than one illegitimate child. Instances are cited of some mothers with as many as 10 or 11 children born out of wedlock. Relief payments in such cases climb above $330 a month, with each new child increasing the amounts of the checks.

The Pennsylvania Legislature has before it a proposal that would deny State aid to unwed mothers of more than two children if they failed to provide suitable homes for their offspring. Families with three or more illegitimate children would be broken up, and the children placed in suitable institutions. No hearings have yet been held on this measure.

In North Carolina, the General Assembly was asked this year to approve sterilization of women who gave birth to two or more illegitimate children. The proposal would give a State eugenics board authority to order the operation only if the mother involved failed to respond to psychiatric treatment.

A survey in North Carolina recently showed that in 1957 some 1,600 white births and 8,700 nonwhite births were registered as illegitimate. The State currently is spending nearly $2.9 million a year in Federal, State, and county funds to help support a total of 13,000 children born out of wedlock.

WASHINGTON: 1 IN 5

Close to 1 in 5 of the children born in Washington, D.C., last year was illegitimate—highest record of illegitimacy in the Nation. The cost to the District of Columbia and Federal Government of supporting 4,000 children of unwed mothers approached $4.5 million, including services and salaries charged to the welfare department.

One Washington mother on relief—still under 30—is reported to have given birth to 10 children by at least 4 different men, one of them her husband. This woman's eldest daughter became pregnant at the age of 11.

District of Columbia officials now are seeking to strengthen a law which empowers them to bring fathers of illegitimate children into court to make them pay for the children's support.

The experience in another area with a large Negro population is told in a report of the Department of Social Welfare of Erie County, N.Y., which includes the city of Buffalo. The department at present is providing $600,000 a month for aid to dependents, of which $240,000 goes for the care of illegitimate children.

Welfare Commissioner Paul F. Burke reported recently that there are numerous cases in the county where grown-up children of out-of-wedlock families become out-of-wedlock mothers themselves and in many instances form a new family in separate living quarters.

In South Dakota, a survey found that half of the unmarried mothers receiving public assistance from the State had borne more than one illegitimate child. In February, 1958, 264 babies were born to unmarried women on relief. Some of the new mothers, the survey found, were the daughters of unwed mothers getting welfare aid. Both the underage mothers and their babies received assistance as dependent children.

Why count is low. The mounting cost of illegitimate births is masked, social workers say, by the difficult task of gathering accurate statistics.

Definitions of illegitimacy differ in the various States. Some States recognize so-called common law marriages in which couples live together without a marriage ceremony, and their children are given the father's name.

Many out-of-wedlock births are hidden by mothers who falsely register in hospitals as married women. In some hospitals, the mother simply is asked: "Are you married?" There is no checkup.

Also, when a married mother gives birth to a child whose father is not her husband, the birth generally is recorded as a legitimate one.

In the District of Columbia, it has been the rule since 1954 that children are ineligible for aid if the mother associates with a man in a relationship similar to that of husband and wife * * * regardless of whether such a man is the father of her children.

Many families of this kind go on and off relief repeatedly. Aid is withdrawn if the case worker finds a man living on the premises. Shortly afterward, the mother is likely to reapply for relief on the ground that the man has deserted her. By this time she may be pregnant again.

HOW AID IS GIVEN

Fear of losing the Federal contribution for aid to all dependent children, including those whose fathers have died, are disabled, or have deserted their mothers, deters many States and cities in their search for ways to cut down the mounting costs of illegitimate births.

The Federal contribution, on the average, pays for 60 percent of the cost of aid to a dependent child. In some States, the Federal payment amounts to as much as 80 percent of the total.

States that have considered reducing or withholding relief payments to unwed mothers of more than one or two children, have been warned that under Federal law they cannot deny assistance to children because of the circumstances of their birth. The threat is that all Federal aid to dependents in that State would be withheld if such restrictions were imposed.

Just before World War II, the United States was spending about $135 million a year on aid to dependent children. Today, that figure has risen to $1.1 billion.

BY 1965: 1 MILLION

The number of illegitimate children being cared for out of public funds has risen sharply—from about 231,000 in 1953 to somewhere between 340,000 and 350,000 today. By 1965, if current trends continue, some authorities say that nearly 1 million children born out of wedlock will be getting public aid.

Welfare officials, at this time, see no hope of reversing this rise in the number of illegitimate births. Unwed mothers are turning up in larger numbers at younger ages.

Year by year, especially in the big cities, authorities are faced with the growing costs of a problem that rests on the shoulders of the American taxpayers.

WELFARE DILEMMA—IN AIDING FATHERLESS CHILD, IT SPURS ILLEGITIMACY

(By Edwin A. Roberts, Jr.)

NEW YORK.—Critics of the public relief system in the United States believe that in one area particularly the quality of mercy shows signs of strain.

This is the division known as aid to dependent children (ADC), a program that costs U.S. taxpayers $815 million annually and which will soon pass the billion-dollar mark. It is the second most expensive relief category (old-age assistance is first at $1.8 billion) and by far the fastest growing. There are now 2,092,000 children in the United States receiving ADC support; about 20 percent of these were born out of wedlock. But this national figure fails to show the extent of illegitimacy in those places where it is an acute problem—a problem that accounts for most of the attacks on ADC.

Established under the Social Security Act of 1935, aid to dependent children was originally intended to provide for youngsters who were fatherless due to death or desertion. In recent years, however, it has been depicted as a contributing factor to the sharp rise in the number of unwed mothers because, its critics charge, it helps encourage illicit sex behavior through eliminating the financial burden that ordinarily would follow an illegitimate birth.

GOTHAM'S PROBLEM

The ADC problem is nowhere greater than in New York City, which spends $84 million a year caring for 200,000 mothers and children. This cost is shared by all U.S. taxpayers who, through the Federal Government, pay $42 million of the total. The State and city each contribute $21 million.

The average monthly ADC payment is $156.60 per case. It is given to any youngster under 16, or under 18 if he is still in school, whose parents (usually just the mother) are unable to provide for him.

Of the 150,000 ADC children in New York, some 40 percent are illegitimate, and 34 percent of the 50,000 mothers are unwed. And 80 percent of the ADC illegitimate children are reported to be in so-called "repeater" families—that is, the mother has two or more illegitimate offspring. The "repeaters" are the chief target of ADC critics.

There are, of course, thousands of ADC cases in New York involving only the most deserving unfortunates: Widows with young children, mothers whose husbands become mentally or physically disabled, and mothers who have been deserted and left without resources. The community responsibility in such cases is clear. It is less clear, however, in instances where the relief client purposely becomes an ADC parasite. A Brooklyn grand jury is currently investigating this aspect of public relief and several women have already been sent to jail.

There are two principal types of ADC chiselers. One is the mother who knows where her deserter-husband is, but doesn't want him back (the husband is usually satisfied with this, too). The other is the unmarried woman who regularly produces children but denies knowledge of the father or fathers. The man in this case sometimes chips in on expenses and claims his illegitimate offspring as income-tax exemptions while the mother collects ADC money.

Welfare investigators are sometimes aware of these situations and raid apartments at night to catch the father. The raiders almost always find some man. Social workers smile ruefully as they recall surprised men in pajamas loudly asserting they were "just visiting"; others sometimes risk their necks with hasty escapes.

REPEAT PERFORMANCE

But even when the men are caught, the welfare people have a difficult time proving who is the father of which child. Often a man will freely admit he's the father and the family will be dropped from the relief rolls. A short time later, however, the mother will notify Welfare that he has disappeared and the whole process starts all over again.

One solution that has been considered, but rarely adopted, in various sections of the country is to bar mothers with more than one illegitimate child from the relief rolls. Most sociologists agree that these "repeaters" are practically incorrigible. But the problem here is that society's sympathy is with the children and no one is anxious to penalize a youngster for the misbehavior of parents.

Whenever possible, ADC children under such influences are placed either in institutions or in foster homes. When left with their "repeater" mothers they often do not get much benefit from the money disbursed in their behalf. Social workers, when out of earshot of their superiors, tell of "ADC parties" that are common in some poor neighborhoods: When the mother receives the monthly check for her child or children, her first stop is the liquor store and then there is a celebration, which may land the mother back in her original predicament.

The welfare employee, knowing his client is misbehaving, is impeded by real fear of getting too tough with some of the reliefers. One mother, for instance, who became angry at a social worker, purposely starved her children, had them committed to a hospital suffering from malnutrition, and the welfare agent on the case was fired.

There is, unfortunately, another side to this coin. Because the welfare department finds it difficult to keep fully staffed, it has been forced to hire some substandard personnel. A few such male employees have demanded favors of ADC mothers and, if the women refuse, the agents cut off their relief checks. Meanwhile, the conscientious caseworker often gets bogged down in redtape. There are dozens of forms to fill out and one employee declared it was possible for him to have to complete 186 in a single day.

The ADC problem is compounded for New York because there is no minimum residence law to put a check on newcomers to the city who immediately apply for relief.

Take the case of Maria R., of Puerto Rico, for example. With two children in tow she stepped from the airliner at Idlewild Airport and walked over to a policeman. Half in tears, she said she expected to meet her husband but he hadn't shown up. Her husband's name was the Spanish equivalent of John Smith, she didn't know where he lived, and she had no money. Yes, she said, the children were hers.

Within a matter of hours the woman and the youngsters were put on the New York City relief rolls. Soon after, they were installed in a $55-a-month flat in Manhattan's upper West Side and began receiving about $60 a week in welfare checks.

SUPPORTED INDEFINITELY

Maria may have told the truth, but social workers say the odds are against it. More likely, they say, Maria decided one day in Puerto Rico that life would be better in New York. Knowing her ADC's and being unmarried, she went to a neighbor in her village who had many children. Maria "borrowed" two of these, raised the plane fare from relatives, and came north. She will now be supported indefinitely and in comparative comfort by U.S. taxpayers.

While acknowledging that such things happen, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico contends that only 15 percent of the Puerto Ricans who come to New York ever go on relief. Social workers say this figure is low.

But certainly the Puerto Ricans have no monopoly when it comes to welfare maneuvering on the New York City front. Scores of other women, usually single and pregnant, skirt the raised eyebrows at home by moving to New York to have their babies while receiving welfare aid. And southern Negroes, many with relatives in New York, come north in droves, especially when the employment situation is rumored to be good.

One cannot study ADC and illegitimacy very long before it becomes clear that the trend reflects some other great socio-economic problems of our day. Henry L. McCarthy, New York City welfare commissioner, has estimated that 83 percent of the children receiving ADC assistance are Negroes and Puerto Ricans, and one good reason for this is that Negro and Puerto Rican children have almost no chance of being adopted. White youngsters, by comparison, have a 70 percent chance. This same high percentage of nonwhites on the ADC rolls is found in almost every section of the country, largely for the same reason.

In New York City, the total number of white children decreased 5 percent between 1920 and 1950. During the same span the nonwhite juvenile population rose 350 percent. Sociologists say this has happened because New York administrations have adopted policies calculated to force middle-income families to the suburbs and, they add, most nonwhites are at the low end of the pay scale.

Whatever the reason, New York City faces ever greater social problems, and these problems are at least in part the problems of the whole Nation. As one welfare critic put it: "There are thousands of people who believe the world owes them a living, and in ADC they see a good way to collect."

ILLEGITIMACY ON THE UPSURGE THROUGHOUT THE NATION

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—A new furore looms over the Nation's rising tide of illegitimacy, highest in history. What should be done to curb it? Is punishment the answer? Here is a closeup of an old but never-ending problem.)

(By Roger Greene)

An alltime record of babies born out of wedlock—more than 200,000 a year—has set off a new storm of controversy over ebbing standards of American morality and the resulting burden on U.S. taxpayers.

In some communities, officials are discussing possible sterilization of women who stray too often from the paths of orthodoxy.

Elsewhere, the debate centers on proposals to cut down relief payments to mothers who produce more than one illegitimate child. In Raleigh, N.C., authorities cite as an example the case of an unmarried mother of 10 children, nine of them receiving public-support funds.

"We are literally paying a bonus for illegitimacy," says State Representative Walter A. Chachere of Louisiana, member of a special legislative committee which is investigating the problem.

Yet some top-ranking sociologists argue that more—not less—should be done to ease the distress of young women caught in the dark web of disgrace, guilt, fear, and panic involved in bearing a child out of wedlock.

CENSURE WON'T HELP

"Punishment is not the answer to the crisis of the unmarried mother," says Mrs. Katherine B. Oettinger, Chief of the U.S. Children's Bureau.

"No amount of censure or hardship will abolish the problem."

Underscoring the financial impact of illegitimacy, the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) says Federal, State, and local taxpayers this year will pay $210 million toward the support of children born out of wedlock. Payments average $27.29 a month per child.

The money is provided under the Government-supported aid to dependent children (ADC) program, with the Federal Government paying 60 percent. State and local taxes contribute 40 percent.

The Nation's exploding population accounts, in part, for the upsurge in illegitimate births from 87,900 in 1938 to 201,700 in 1957, the latest official figure. An HEW estimate for 1958 puts the number at 205,000. But experts say this doesn't tell the whole story.

Latest figures show the rate of such births per 1,000 unmarried females has tripled in the last 2 decades, with a particularly alarming rise among teenage girls.

On a nationwide basis, the Office of Vital Statistics says illegitimacy now accounts for 19.6 per 1,000 total white births and 206.7 per 1,000 nonwhite.

The Federal agency's figures show that while illegitimacy among whites has actually decreased slightly over the last 2 decades, the rate among nonwhites has shot up by leaps and bounds.

Thus, white illegitimacy has dropped from 20.5 per 1,000 total white births in 1938 to 19.6 in 1957, while the nonwhite rate has soared from 166.5 to 206.7 in the same period.

Sociologists declare, however, that the figures may not be a true reflection of the facts. They say well-to-do white families often conceal the plight of an unmarried pregnant daughter, and the baby is quietly put out to adoption by another family.

Mrs. Oettinger says nearly 5,000 illegitimate babies are born each year to girls under 15. Some have even confessed they deliberately became pregnant so they could quit school.

"Unwed motherhood among adolescents is on the rise and will continue," says Mrs. Oettinger. "By 1962, if the rate remains the same, between 110,000 and 120,000 babies will be born out of wedlock to teenage girls."

Mrs. Oettinger says it was "a bright new day" when New York's Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller recently signed a law permitting public welfare officials to give aid to an unmarried mother and her child without communicating with her parents.

Worried parents and officials in some communities are calling for action to halt the rising tide of illegitimacy.

Local authorities in Elizabeth, N.J., alarmed over relief payments hitting a 20-year high, ruled in April that benefits will no longer be paid to mothers for more than one child born out of wedlock.

In Buffalo, N.Y., the Erie County Welfare Department reports it spent more than $2½ million, or 10 percent of its budget, in aid to illegitimate children in 1958.

And in Louisiana, the State legislature found that 17,000 of the State's estimated 100,000 illegitimate children are on public relief rolls. The legislature said that since the aid program began "there has been an appalling increase in the number of illegitimate children born."

Disturbed over the sharp upswing in teenage pregnancies in Washington, where segregation in the schools was abolished in 1954, education authorities launched a pioneer program of sex education in seven elementary schools this year.

Youngsters 11 and 12, with the consent of their parents, were shown films of the reproductive process. The educational program's effect has yet to be measured.

Dr. John R. Pate, chief of the District of Columbia Bureau of Disease Control, says there has been an "alarming increase" in the number of pregnant girls in the 7th, 8th, and 9th grades.

During a single school year, he says, 178 Negro girls and 12 white girls, all under 16, were found to be pregnant. Seven of the girls were 11, the youngest was 10.

Tragic as the situation appears, the tragedy would be compounded many times were it not for the nationwide network of homes for unwed mothers without fanfare by the Salvation Army, the Florence Crittenton Association and many religious organizations.

[From the Athens (Ga.) Banner-Herald, Aug. 28, 1959]

ILLEGITIMACY PROBLEM CONTINUES TO GROW

It is indefensible that a nation which professes and practices a wide latitude of sophistication in the humanities should allow the process of human reproduction—truly one of the most amazing and wonderful feats man is capable of performing—to be dragged through the gutters of smut and innuendo, mainly because snickering adolescents of all ages continue to perpetuate the myth which holds there is something indecent about it.

Even more tragic is the heavy penalty centuries of misinformation and coverups have awarded to the young generation of today. Obviously aware of the confused and insecure attitude of their parents toward sex, teenagers too often follow their curiosity without the guidance needed to prevent them from committing tragic errors.

One of the results is a record 200,000 illegtimate births each year, with teenagers becoming increasingly involved. One of every 50 white births and one of five nonwhite births are now illegitimate, and 5,000 babies are born out of wedlock each year to mothers who are less than 15 years old.

One after another, communities across the country have found relief payments to unwed mothers soaring, until some have found it necessary to place limitations on public assistance to those on relief rolls simply because of illegitimate pregnancy. More than $2.5 million was spent by New York's Erie County, containing the city of Buffalo, for aid to illegitimate children in 1958. Elizabeth, N.J., after watching its relief payments soar to new 25-year highs, cut off payments to all but the first child born out of wedlock. Many cities have uncovered cases of women with as many as three or four illegitimate children who are on the rolls at tax payers' expense.

The situation cannot be corrected by deciding how much the community should subsidize the errant steps of ill-informed residents, but at least the sizable chunk now being taken from every budget for this purpose has awakened some relief officials from their lethargy.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S VISIT ABROAD

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, certain headlines in the papers read as follows: "Eisenhower Melts British Calm"; "Glowing Scotland Enfolds President"; "Eisenhower Magic Working Its Spell."

These and other headlines, including the wonderful reception by the German people of the President and the overwhelming welcome that he received in Britain, indicate that he is a very good salesman of the American way of life. Of course, we Americans have a right to feel that a lot of this enthusiasm in the greeting of the head of this Nation reflects the affection of the people for other Americans.

The President is really demonstrating a new Mr. Eisenhower, and some of us who saw him just before his departure feel that he is in wonderful health and is enjoying this new experience.

I rather feel that the spirit of the former Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, has entered into him. Perhaps the prayers of the American people, and also the prayers of people all over this earth, that he can break through the mist and break through the barriers that seem to confuse this world in this day of challenges, have stimulated him to renewed effort.

Yes, perhaps the prayers of the American people have stimulated him to go forward in his great effort to find the way, to find the truth, and to find a life that will not mean another war.

I am sure it is the hope of all that guidance—yes, divine guidance—will be given the President to work out the unity which is necessary in this troubled world to bring an understanding into the picture we are confronting, not only in Europe, with the Kremlin, but really all over the world, so that there will result a unity between our allies and ourselves that will not be subject to being broken up by any one human factor.

Furthermore, we are hoping this great experience our great public servant is having will have an impression upon Khrushchev. I notice by the papers that Khrushchev is bringing his wife and family.

Yes, it is a day of real challenges, Mr. President, when we can hope and pray that the leadership of this Nation will again lead the world, as he led it in a time of war, to success.

There appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of August 28 a couple of very short editorials entitled "Eisenhower in Bonn," and "And in London." I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EISENHOWER IN BONN

The enthusiastic reception accorded to President Eisenhower between Wahn airport and Bonn on his visit to Chancellor Adenauer is an indication of the degree to which Germany and America have grown together in the little more than 10 years since they were enemies.

There are a number of reasons why a feeling of kinship could arise. Some trace back to early Saxony through the first English settlers in what is now the United States. Some derive from waves of immigration which made German-Americans the most numerous group of new citizens early this century.

There is an area of understanding in the American and the German disposition to go to work and get things done. Even through wars an American liking for German cultural qualities, as represented notably in music, has survived.

But of course the great tie between the United States and West Germany today is the fact that America and the self-governing portion of Germany now are on the same side in the division of the world as between Communist totalitarianism and individual freedom. That issue is sharpened in the pressures on West Berlin. It gave urgency and seriousness to the whole range of private talks between President and Chancellor.

To be sure, only West Germany could express itself in the cheering, welcoming throng of a quarter of a million persons along the President's arrival route. But in contrast with this demonstration the cool impassiveness of crowds which saw Soviet Premier Khrushchev in Leipzig and East Berlin last March is clear indication that East Germans also look toward the West for hope of national reunification and a better life.

Americans in general can feel that some of the greeting bestowed on Mr. Eisenhower was intended also for them. And noting the readiness of West Germans and West Berliners to defend the freedom they have, they will echo the President's assurance that "the American people stand by your side."

AND IN LONDON

Is this a visit to a foreign capital, or a homecoming? The suddenly overflowing warmth of stately little Bonn, remarkable as that was, could hardly forecast the floodtides of affection on which the President has been borne up in London.

As one report put it: "Not since the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II has this staid old city paid such tribute to an individual."

This was not a matter of Ike's being the first American President to visit Britain officially since Woodrow Wilson's day. It was a recapturing of some of "our finest hours." These were hours of British history of which the wartime Churchill had spoken. But they were to be shared, and can be shared again, in the pursuit of peace, by all the Western World.

The British welcome augurs well for the business Ike must accomplish on this trip.

British methods for dealing with the problems which have taken the President to Europe are almost the opposite of the West German approach. Prime Minister Macmillan seems as intent on a summit meeting to climax the Eisenhower tour as Dr. Adenauer is skeptical about its usefulness. And where Dr. Adenauer would naturally like to know in advance just what subjects the President will discuss with his Soviet visitor at Washington next month, the British appear eager to remove just as many Presidential inhibitions as possible.

The British have more than one reason to be satisfied with the way things are developing around the Eisenhower visit.

Even if a four-power summit proves elusive, "summits" are already being touched by the President and Prime Minister in London now, and looming for Nikita and Ike in Washington in mid-September. These will give Mr. Macmillan somewhere to hang a well-feathered cap as election time rolls around in Britain.

It is worth risking an oversimplification here to emphasize that "summitry" is the key to British attitudes right now. And for other than political reasons.

Some of these reasons may need reexamination. Can the West afford, for example, to base its diplomacy on fears that if the Soviets get really tough at Berlin the job of supplying West Berliners with material and moral support may prove beyond Western capacity? Some British reports stress this problem.

But other reasons express a more positive approach. The British say they are under no illusions that two-power talks will bring an end to the cold war, or that even a four-power summit would be more than a prelude to a long contest at innumerable conference tables. They do not think Soviet aims have changed at Berlin or in the cold war generally or that Soviet pressures on the West will lighten during these talks.

But they believe the West will gain advantages if the cold war can be transformed from its present frozen state into a struggle of maneuver. So in London the new phase of cold war opened up by the Eisenhower visit is viewed not as a retreat and softening under Soviet pressure, not as a disengagement but as a reengagement on new ground with new weapons of negotiation in which the British have an age-tested faith.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Has the Senator from Wisconsin exceeded the 3-minute limit?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired. The Chair wanted to recognize the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Wisconsin desire unanimous consent to continue? I shall be glad to yield to him so that he may make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WILEY. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. While I have been recognized by the Chair, I shall be glad to afford the Senator from Wisconsin the courtesy of permitting him to make a unanimous-consent request for further time, if he desires to do so. I have morning business to transact.

Mr. WILEY. I have more matters to put in the RECORD, but our beloved friend from Illinois is much annoyed and very irritable nowadays. Yesterday, when he presided, he permitted Senators to talk 5 to 7 to 8 to 10 minutes, and he never exercised his authority to tell them they were overstepping their time limit.

EFFECTS OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY WORK STOPPAGE ON EMPLOYMENT IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the effects of the work stoppage in the steel industry on employment in Pennsylvania are being surveyed weekly by the bureau of employment security and reports made to Gov. David L. Lawrence at regular intervals.

I ask unanimous consent that the latest of such reports may appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The effects of the work stoppage in the steel industry on employment in Pennsylvania are being surveyed weekly by the bureau of employment security and reports made to Gov. David L. Lawrence at regular intervals according to William L. Batt, Jr., secretary of labor and industry. The following is the most recent report prepared as of August 25, 1959:

Effects of the steel industry work stoppage on employment in Pennsylvania as of Aug. 25, 1959

		Change from Aug. 18
32,238 workers in industries covered by the Pennsylvania unemployment compensation law are unemployed as an indirect effect of the work stoppage in the steel industry		+2,742
They are distributed by industry as follows:
Nonmanufacturing industries, subtotal	23,067	+1,480
Mining	15,572	+631
Construction	4,337	+454
Transportation other than railroads	1,503	+168
Trade and service	1,302	+222
Public utilities	353	+5
Manufacturing industries, subtotal	9,171	+1,262
Metals and metal products	6,056	+876
Stone, clay, and glass	1,982	+249
Lumber	239	−6
Chemicals	291	+18
Other manufacturing	603	+125
12,957 railroad workers, most of whom are covered for unemployment compensation through the Federal railroad unemployment compensation program, are unemployed as an indirect effect of the steelwork stoppage		+130
168,200 steelworkers are directly involved in the work stoppage and are not drawing Pennsylvania unemployment compensation benefits		None

The following tabulation shows the workers directly and indirectly affected by the steelwork stoppage in the various Pennsylvania State Employment Service administrative districts:

PSES administrative district	Steelworkers directly involved	Workers indirectly affected
		Railroad workers	Other workers
Total	168,200	12,957	32,238
7. Pittsburgh	91,800	8,120	7,443
2. Allentown	21,200	903	1,080
8. Greensburg	17,600	1,088	14,398
6. Altoona	13,300	1,111	5,184
9. Erie	8,000	195	1,093
1. Philadelphia	7,800	550	2,320
5. Harrisburg	7,300	567	357
4. Williamsport	1,200	411	77
3. Wilkes-Barre	0	2	196
10. Stroudsburg	0	10	90

The 67 counties are divided into the following Pennsylvania State Employment Service districts:

District No.	District office	Counties
1	Philadelphia	Philadelphia, Delaware, Bucks (southern portion).
2	Allentown	Northampton, Lehigh, Berks, Bucks (except southern portion), Montgomery, Chester.
3	Wilkes-Barre	Susquehanna, Wayne, Wyoming, Lackawanna, Luzerne (except western and southern portions).
4	Williamsport	Potter, Tioga, Bradford, Clinton, Lycoming, Sullivan, Union, Snyder, Montour, Columbia, Northumberland, Luzerne (western portion).
5	Harrisburg	Mifflin, Juniata, Perry, Dauphin, Lebanon, Cumberland, Lancaster, Franklin, Adams, York, Fulton.
6	Altoona	Elk, Cameron, Jefferson, Clearfield, Centre, Indiana, Cambria, Blair, Huntingdon, Somerset, Bedford.
7	Pittsburgh	Lawrence, Butler, Beaver, Allegheny.
8	Greensburg	Armstrong, Westmoreland, Washington, Greene, Fayette.
9	Erie	Erie, Crawford, Warren, Mercer, Venango, Forest, Clarion, McKean.
10	Stroudsburg	Pike, Monroe, Carbon, Schuylkill, Luzerne (southern portion).

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this report shows a very serious condition with respect to unemployment in Pennsylvania not only as it affects steel workers directly, but indirectly other workers who are out of jobs because of the effects of the strike.

I should like to join my colleagues from New York and Vermont in the statements they made in this body yesterday in urging that those who are involved in this unfortunate situation get together for an agreement before the Taft-Hartley injunction is applied, which will only make matters worse.

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, during the last few days the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has suggested on the floor of the Senate a method of handling the highway revenue problem without the necessity of increasing the gasoline tax. I find myself in complete accord with my distinguished friend from Tennessee in hoping it will not be necessary to increase the tax on gasoline. On the other hand, I am not in favor of his suggestion of cutting appropriation by 1 percent as a wise way to handle the problem.

I should like to suggest an alternative for the consideration of the Members of the Senate. It is this: We should transfer to the highway trust fund the receipts from excise taxes on passenger cars, auto parts and accessories, and trucks and buses, in an amount sufficient to permit the highway program to go forward. I shall not deal with the detailed figures at this point, but there is more than enough money provided by those excise taxes to permit the highway program to go forward.

Then, so as to avoid a deficit in the general fund of the Treasury, let us enact some of the tax loophole closing provisions which have already been before the Senate. I suggest enactment of three such provisions.

The first has already been passed by the Senate, in the form of the amendment sponsored by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], to repeal the 4-percent dividend credit. This would yield $335 million in the year starting January 1, 1960.

Second, I suggest the enactment of a provision withholding taxes on dividends at the source, which would yield some $180 million during calendar 1960. We should consider seriously the same action with respect to interest payments, which would yield three times that amount.

Finally, we should tighten the rules on business expense deductions in the area of luxury expense account expenditures.

If these actions were taken, Mr. President, we would be able to go forward with the highway program, and we would not have to increase the tax on gasoline, which is a regressive tax.

We could trim close a number of inequitable tax loopholes, so that the Treasury will not suffer one cent of deficit as the result of our actions in keeping the highway program in funds.

I hope my colleagues will give some attention to this suggestion, so that when the matter comes before the Senate we can give it serious consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a tentative memorandum indicating the extent of the figures about which I have been talking may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks. This memorandum is not definitive or final, but will give some guidance to my fellow Senators in their consideration of the matter.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A. Highway trust fund deficit: At present rate of expenditure, the highway trust fund balance will be exhausted by October 1959. Budget Director Stans stated on July 22, 1959: "In the absence of (congressional) action, the highway trust fund will incur a deficit now estimated at about $500 million in the fiscal year 1960 and, even though no further apportionment is made, the cumulative deficit will increase to about $1 billion by the close of fiscal 1961."

B. Auto excise tax receipts now going to general fund which could be transferred to highway trust fund: Budget estimates for fiscal 1960: Passenger cars, $985 million; auto parts and accessories, $120 million; trucks and buses, $114 million (this sum is 50 percent of the budget estimate; the other 50 percent already goes to the highway trust fund).

C. Revenue by closing loopholes:

1. Repeal of dividend credit, $335 million.

2. Withholding of taxes on dividends at source, $180 million.

3. Prevent business expense deductions for luxury expense account expenditures; business gifts; certain travel expenses to foreign countries; and dues and initiation fees in social organizations, $800 million.

PROPOSED WORLD'S FAIR IN 1964

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have a number of items in the morning hour business.

I wish to address myself to Senate Resolution 169, which is on the calendar, which relates to the World's Fair contemplated for 1964.

Mr. President, I should like to say a word upon this subject. With the greatest respect and regard for the views which are contained in the resolution, Senate Resolution 169, I wish to make it clear that there are certain preliminary acts which must be taken if any American city is to qualify, whether it be New York City, Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, Chicago, or any other great American city. Certainly, we do not wish to close the door to that kind of qualification, whatever may be the ultimate choice of a city.

Mr. President, the purport of my view is to leave the door open, so that all cities which have any serious purpose in this matter can qualify preliminarily. Then I would vest the President with the necessary authority, if he chooses to pick out one American city; and, if the President does not so choose, and I really do not see why he should wish to do so, I would leave it to the international agency which is functioning in these matters to pick out an American city.

I think all of us wish collectively to guard against the exigency that we may do something which will prevent any city from doing anything. I am sure that is not the intention of anyone.

I wish to emphasize very clearly that the city of New York, in this particular matter of a World's Fair, has the right to feel such a sense of confidence in its own capability to do what is necessary to make for the United States a fair truly representative of the world and of the United States that it does not have to go around cutting out other cites, and does not have to fear the competition of other cities. If any other city or place in the United States can do better than New York, that will be in New York's tradition of sportmanship, fine with New York; but we do not think other cities can. I think most anyone who looks at the matter reasonably—judging from my knowledge of the great city in which I have the honor to have been born, and which my colleague [Mr. KEATING] and I represent in the Senate of the United States—will feel that we certainly do not have to fear competition from other cities.

I wish to emphasize, Mr. President—and I invite the attention of Members of the Senate—that the suggestion I am making this morning, should be examined with the most critical eye, because what we are trying to do is to see that any city which can qualify does qualify. We are perfectly willing to see the choice made based upon all the proper elements of choice. We are quite confident that in that respect New York City can at the very least hold its own.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one of the Washington, D.C., newspapers, in commenting upon the proposed World's Fair, made a statement to the effect that a promoter's dream, in reference, I suppose, to the efforts of New York to have the fair held in New York, should not be allowed to interfere with the choice of Washington as the most logical city as the site of the next fair. It is perfectly natural and understandable that the Washington papers would support having the fair in Washington. They would not be very good citizens if they did not.

The fact of the matter is that the proposed fair will require a substantial amount of money. New York City has in the past handled such events with great success, as in the case of the World's Fair held in New York some years ago.

I do not believe that the Congress would be disposed to put up the money which would be required if the fair were to be held in Washington, D.C. I do not think anything like the amount of the Federal contribution which would be required in the case of a Washington fair would be required if the fair were held in New York City.

I am gratified that in the other body the resolution of the distinguished Representative, Mrs. KELLY, has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. I hope that we will be able to hammer out in the Senate a piece of legislation which will either designate New York as the site of the fair or which will leave the competition open. In any such open competition, I am confident that New York City will be able to hold its own, and in fact do a great deal more than that.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for joining me in this proposal. I know my colleague is as dedicated as I am to seeing how we can work this matter out in the best way for our country and for our great city of New York.

Mr. President, I desire to address myself to another subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has the floor.

DESEGREGATION OF SCHOOLS PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to refer to a very interesting analysis published in the New York Times of Sunday entitled "Report on Integration: The Outlook as Term Begins."

Mr. President, September is traditionally the back-to-school month. Throughout the Nation youngsters are returning to classes—with some exceptions—in the traditional American custom which assures an education to all its children, whatever may be their color.

This report indicates, Mr. President, that progress is being made in integration of the public schools in accordance with the 1954 Supreme Court decision. Many communities have found that integration of schools does not hold the terrors so many had imagined, and that, indeed, desegregation has proceeded without incident. Other communities have provided terrors of their own manufacture in an effort to forestall the law of the land. Still other communities have turned their backs on the Supreme Court decision and have sought every device to avoid what in our country, in my opinion, is inevitable; that is, equal opportunity for all to have the same kind of education.

Mr. President, whatever may be our individual views—certainly it is well known what my views are in terms of carrying out the Supreme Court decision—this analysis and report will be interesting to all, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT ON INTEGRATION: THE OUTLOOK AS TERM BEGINS

(By Claude Sitton)

ATLANTA, August 29.—One development stands out as school bells sound across the South for the beginning of the sixth year of classes under the Supreme Court's desegregation ruling. This is the emergence of a growing determination to maintain public education even at the price of token compliance with that ruling.

From Norfolk to Little Rock and from Memphis to Miami, there are indications that many southerners have weighed the doctrine of bitter-end resistance and found it wanting. Closed schools have proved to be too great a sacrifice in both educational and economic terms.

Pockets of unyielding opposition remain in the upper South; the Deep South is still locked in a posture of defiance. Many observers consider it more than likely that some communities and possibly entire States will abolish public education for a time before swinging into line. But the tide of protest against such a drastic course is rising and the overall picture presented by the region is one of slow and sometimes halting progress toward desegregation.

Reaction to the 1954 ruling has varied widely among the 17 States affected. There was a burst of compliance in the border area even before the Court handed down its implementation decision a year later. In the middle South, the attitude ranged from one of grudging acceptance to massive resistance. The Deep South presented a solid front of opposition.

FIGURES TELL STORY

This pattern of compliance and defiance is shown in the statistical summary of the Southern Education Reporting Service. This is a factfinding agency directed by southern editors and educators and financed by the Ford Foundation.

Out of a total of 786 school districts in the border area with both white and Negro students, 590 had some desegregation at the end of the 1958–59 school year. This area embraces Missouri, Oklahoma, Kentucky, West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, and the District of Columbia.

With the exception of the Nation's Capital, all have relatively small percentages of Negroes in their populations. Race relations have followed a less rigid pattern than in the lower South. The leadership of these States has generally taken a stand for obedience to the ruling.

Only Delaware, where 17 of 51 biracial districts were integrated last year, has lagged. However, Negroes were scheduled to be admitted throughout the State this year under a 12-year stair-step plan proposed by the Delaware Board of Education and approved by a Federal court. Desegregation will begin with the first grade.

DEEP SOUTH

Five States of the old Confederacy—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina—have moved further away from the court's directive with each passing year. New laws and constitutional amendments have been passed to strengthen segregation statutes already on the books.

This area has the heaviest density of Negroes in its population. Although industrialization and urbanization have modified its attitude somewhat, it remains a stronghold of bitter resistance to racial change. With few exceptions, its leaders have followed a policy of dead-end opposition to desegregation, and there has been none.

Of the six States remaining, all but Florida have lowered racial bars in their public schools to some degree and Florida is scheduled to do so this fall. The others in this group are Arkansas, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. That their compliance has been of a token nature is shown by the fact that of 1,461 biracial school districts, only 144 had any integration last term.

OUTLOOK FOR 1959

The outlook as schools reopened was for limited extension of desegregation in Arkansas, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia.

In Arkansas the four Little Rock High Schools reopened August 12, two with token integration.

Forty miles to the south, a potentially explosive situation developed at the Dollarway High School. The rural school has been ordered to admit three Negroes when it opens September 8.

The Dollarway School Board has appealed the decision and is expected to postpone the opening until the outcome is finally decided. Law-enforcement officers and civic leaders interviewed at nearby Pine Bluff this week declared there would be violence if the school were desegregated.

START IN FLORIDA

In Florida the Dade County Board of Public Instruction directed the admission of four Negroes to Orchard Villa Elementary School in Miami. It also approved the admission of other Negroes to a county-operated school at Homestead Air Force Base.

This marked the first official move toward desegregation in Florida. However, a check of Dade County school records showed that a white girl attended an all-Negro school during the 1956–57 year and that in 1957–58 three Negroes and five students of mixed parentage were enrolled in an all-white school.

The third year of token compliance in North Carolina will see desegregation spread to three new communities. This will bring to seven the number that have opened previously white schools to Negroes.

While Nashville schools will desegregate the third grade under the city's stairstep plan of integrating a grade at a time, attention in Tennessee has been focused on Memphis State University. The State institution has announced that it will admit Negroes for the first time this year.

The prospect in Virginia ranges from substantial compliance to the ultimate in resistance. The second year of desegregation will start in Norfolk, Alexandria, and Arlington Counties.

Charlottesville, a city with great symbolic stature because it was the home of Thomas Jefferson and is the site of the State university, will admit three Negroes to a white high school and eight to a white elementary school.

At Front Royal a citizens' group has delayed a decision whether to reopen a private high school there. About 780 white students attended the institution last year but only 530 enrolled for the coming term. A total of 336 whites and 18 Negroes registered at Warren County High, which is scheduled to open September 8.

SCHOOLS CLOSED

Prince Edward County, in the center of southside Virginia, has become the first southern community to abolish its public school system rather than comply with the Supreme Court's decision. NAACP lawyers are expected to test this action in the Federal courts.

But throughout the region there is evidence that all save the five "hard-core" States would come to terms with the Federal courts in the not-too-distant future. This is the result of the growing realization that the choice is one of at least token compliance or no schools at all.

There is also the economic lesson of Little Rock. Business and professional men there threw their full weight behind the move to open the schools after becoming convinced that the situation threatened the city with economic strangulation.

With the examples of Arkansas and Virginia before them, even some of the larger cities in the Deep South are beginning to rebel against the policy of no compromise.

BIG CITIES

Atlanta and New Orleans have been told by the Federal courts that some start toward compliance must be made in the 1960–61 school year. There is a growing demand in both cities for the right to decide the matter by local option.

The past year has also seen the organization of citizens' groups dedicated to the task of keeping the schools open. In a report on the desegregation question, the Southern Regional Council noted that much of the membership of these groups was made up of those who believe in segregation.

The council, an interracial agency that seeks to promote better white-Negro relations in the South, called this fact "profoundly impressive."

"For southerners to affirm publicly that racial traditions are of only secondary value in their social structure is a long, crucial step toward abandonment of racial snobbery and inequalities," the council declared. "It is moreover, another demonstration that race is not the central concern of large segments of the southern electorate."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I point out that the report shows five States—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina—which have moved further away from the Court's directive, rather than closer to it, with each passing year. New laws and constitutional amendments have been passed to strengthen segregation statutes already on the books in those States.

Mr. President, I point that out because I think it is very important, when we are talking about proposed legislation, to bear in mind how the process has gone in the Southern States, when we talk about the fact that enlightenment and education will bring about reforms. I think enlightenment and education are critically important, but I think they have to be backed up by law.

Mr. President, I desire to address myself to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor.

CIVIL DEFENSE—THE QUICK AND THE DEAD

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on the subject of civil defense, I noted with great interest the comments of my colleague, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] upon that subject. I wish to call attention to the fact that backing up and outlining in the clearest terms this title, which could very well be "The Quick and the Dead in Terms of Civil Defense," is the fact that we ourselves have become tied up in conference on the independent offices appropriation bill over what is a miniscule sum of $12 million, intended to match funds spent by State and local governments for personnel and administrative costs of civil defense. This $12 million can be the seed money which gets going on a solid basis all of the individual efforts of the individual 50 States.

These "matching funds are required," Mr. President—and these are the words of the President of the United States—"to strengthen civil defense at the State and local levels, the very heart of civil defense, and to give tangible evidence of Federal leadership in encouraging State and local governments to prepare the defenses for the people."

This excerpt which I have read is from the message of the President of the United States, sent up to Congress on August 25, 1959, referring specifically to this appropriation which is hung up in the independent offices conference.

Mr. President, it is shocking to me that with a report, not of some Government bureau, but of a congressional committee, which pictures a toll of 50 million in an atomic attack on the United States and which says that civil defense can cut fallout fatalities from 25 percent to 3 percent—just think of it; from 25 percent to 3 percent—here we are denying and having tied up in conference all this time, in a bill of enormous appropriations, incidentally, which involves billions of dollars, this minor appropriation of $12 million, to get the output in terms of skill and ability of the people of our States and communities to help in the civil defense program.

Mr. President, it is almost inconceivable to me that this could be the case, and it seems to me that the report of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, for which we all must be very grateful, should be the final and absolutely certain determination that Congress should move forward without any further delay to allow this $12 million, this rather miniscule sum which is involved.

Mr. President, may I point out that the whole shelter program, which the committee estimates at $20 billion, represents less than 10 percent of the average per capita annual tax burden of about $568 today in America, an expenditure of $50 for each life saved.

Mr. President, I again urge upon the conferees on the independent offices appropriation bill their prompt and immediate action with respect to these civil defense matching funds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired. Does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield the floor.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, it should be apparent by now that the opponents of the lake diversion bill are carrying on a filibuster with the intent of wearing out the advocates of the bill, so that as a result of fatigue the bill will either be killed or referred to a committee which will kill it. The opponents have at various times tried to entice the Senator from Illinois into entering into a discussion with them on the floor, thus helping them in their filibuster, and later enabling them to blame the Senator from Illinois for delaying discussion of the bill. In order to prevent this from happening, I have refused to enter into full discussion.

From time to time, however, they do make criticisms which I think should be answered. I therefore ask unanimous consent that memorandums which I have had prepared dealing with some of the criticisms which have been voiced by the opponents of the pending bill be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandums were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. LAKE DIVERSION AND CANADA

The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Ohio have stated that the adoption of this legislation would be in disregard of a treaty of the United States with Canada. Both gentlemen know (or should know) that in the negotiations for the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty, a reservation was made for the diversion of water at Chicago, in the amount of 10,000 cubic feet per second. This was the reason for the disparity of 16,000 cubic feet per second in favor of Canada, in the distribution of water for power purposes at Niagara. Canada was allocated 36,000 cubic feet per second and the United States 20,000 cubic feet per second.

The monetary value of this excess diversion to Canada, from 1910 to 1949, was about $172 million. The Chicago diversion averaged 5,238 cubic feet per second during this period, or about 53 percent of the 10,000 cubic feet per second reserved for it (pp. 20–22 of hearings on H.R. 1 and S. 308).

The matter of this reservation of 10,000 cubic feet per second of water for Chicago was adequately explained, to the Senate, in 1910 by Secretary of State Elihu Root, when the treaty was before the Senate for ratification. He stated that Lake Michigan was not a boundary water and he would not let them put anything in the treaty about Lake Michigan.

The Chicago drainage canal had been constructed by 1900 to its flow capacity, 10,000 cubic feet per second, and its supply channel, the South Branch of the Chicago River, was being improved to that same flow capacity. However, in 1900 the capacity of the Chicago River had been improved only to capacity to flow 5,000 cubic feet per second, without currents which would be obstructive to navigation. So, the permit from the Secretary of War to open the channel and cause the waters of the Chicago River to flow into the same, carried a limitation of 5,000 cubic feet per second in the flow. This was subsequently fixed at 4,167 cubic feet per second, in December 1901.

By 1912, the Chicago River improvement had been completed to its planned flow capacity of 10,000 cubic feet per second, and in that year, the Sanitary District of Chicago applied to Secretary of War Stimson for a removal of the limitation of 4,167 cubic feet per second and for a permit to flow 10,000 cubic feet per second. Canada objected at the hearings before Secretary Stimson. This objection was made despite the reservation of 10,000 cubic feet per second made just 3 years before, in 1909 treaty negotiations. Secretary Stimson denied the request for an increase in the diversion and suggested that the sanitary district seek action in Congress. The sanitary district, however, elected to have its rights tried in the Federal Court. Suit was filed by the Government in 1913, decided by the Supreme Court January 1925. The authority of the Secretary of War was upheld. The Secretary of War granted a permit, March 3, 1925, for a diversion of 8,500 cubic feet per second, in addition to domestic pumpage for 5 years. Canada did not object to this. The Lake States case then ensued from November 1926 to the Supreme Court decree of April 21, 1930. Canada took no part in this.

The United States has never failed to keep its word; and could not be charged with unilateral action now if it approved the pending legislation.

Chicago, in constructing the drainage canal and improving the Chicago River, was cooperating completely with the Federal Government in its efforts to develop a commercially useful waterway, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The study to be authorized by the pending legislation can determine what is needed to provide decent conditions for navigation in this Federal waterway. It is not for local sanitation.

Chicago is already conducting the largest and most complete sewage treatment operation that can be found in any large city in the world. It can do no more; and should be commended, not only for its effective efforts in matters of sanitation, but for its very important contributions to navigation.

2. THE ACTUAL DIVERSION OF ADDITIONAL WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN IS NECESSARY FOR A SIGNIFICANT TEST

It has been suggested that the bill H.R. 1 be amended to provide for the 3-year study without the authority for a 1-year additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second at Chicago. Except for the study of lake currents, and perhaps some other features, such a theoretical study would not reveal much more than has been already computed by sanitary engineers of the sanitary district.

In order to put the difficult sanitary situation of the Chicago metropolitan area into proper perspective, consider that this is probably the largest concentration of population and its resulting pollution which is not adjacent to an ocean or a large river; the latter conditions make sewage disposal comparatively easy. Chicago's position makes its waste disposal critical, difficult and expensive; probably the most difficult in the world. The Chicago Sanitary District has done an extraordinary job toward solving this problem; it has constructed and operates the largest and most advanced sewage treatment facilities in the world in order to give what is usually accepted as complete treatment. However, this nominally complete treatment is not dependable for more than about 90 percent removal of polluting material. The untreated residual, equivalent to the raw sewage from a city with a population of approximately 800,000, cannot be put back into the lake without seriously contaminating its water supply and bathing beaches as has recently been experienced on a small scale by Milwaukee, Toronto, Cleveland, and other Great Lakes cities. The alternative is to discharge the effluent, with its residual pollution, into the Illinois Waterway, as is now being done. However, the Illinois Waterway has inadequate dilution capacity to absorb the residual pollution. The result is an unpleasant environmental condition for some distance below the city of Joliet. Also, the city of Peoria, which has a critical shortage of domestic water, is planning to use Illinois River water, but is faced with considerable difficulty in treating this water to obtain an acceptable degree of safety.

Thus Chicago is in a position which can be remedied only by unusual sanitary measures or by moving its location. Studies of Chicago's problem will be useful to other Great Lakes cities, and the results may save them many deaths and their governments much criticism as their populations increase in step with the commercial growth resulting from the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Specifically, this actual diversion for 1 year is necessary to a really significant test because there are factors such as temperature, degree of undersaturation, rate of utilization, and coefficient of absorption which either must be determined for the actual conditions or are seasonal, thereby requiring a full year of data.

Temperature effects are important because the saturation level of oxygen dissolved in water decreases with increases in temperature; for fresh water this saturation level is 14.6 parts per million at 32° F., 9.0 parts per million at 70° F., and 7.3 parts per million at 90° F. These are subject to variation due to different amounts of pollution in the water. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.

The degree of undersaturation is the difference between the actual amount of oxygen dissolved in the water and the saturation level. The rate of absorption of oxygen varies inversely as the degree of undersaturation.

The rate of utilization of oxygen, by the dissolved and suspended organic matter in the water, is affected by temperature, nature of the pollution, and amount of mixing which takes place. This rate of utilization affects the degree of undersaturation. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.

The coefficient of absorption is an emperical factor which is applied to other factors in determining the rate at which oxygen goes into solution in the water; it is affected by the quantity and nature of impurities in the water, and the amount of mixing which results from the velocity of flow and characteristics of the stream bed. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.

Another feature, about which there has been much speculation but to which only an actual test can supply the answer, is whether or not an additional amount of fresh water would sufficiently dilute the concentrated nitrogenous material carried into the Illinois River from the treated sewage effluent to reduce the excessive growth of algae and obnoxious water plants.

In summary, the actual additional diversion is necessary to supply data on the several emperical factors which are necessary to determine if this method would provide the necessary relief for this overall public health problem and for a desirable improvement in conditions of navigation.

3. THEORETICAL POWER LOSS

Total flow in St. Lawrence: 240,000 cubic feet per second.

Maximum reduction of flow in St. Lawrence due to a 1,000 cubic feet per second diversion at Chicago is about 220 cubic feet per second. (Smith, 218 c.f.s. p. 408; Ramey, 220 c.f.s. p. 345). This maximum reduction is about one-tenth of 1 percent of total flow.

After diversion has been in effect for 1 year and diversion has ceased, the recovery in water levels and flow quantities will start.

The reduction in flow at Massena will be about as follows:

	Cubic feet per second, end of year
1st year, diversion	220
2d year, recovery	140
3d year, recovery	90
4th year, recovery	60
5th year, recovery	40
6th year, recovery	25
8th to 15th year, reduction	10–0

"It, therefore, has accepted the loss at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence as $608,000. Subtracting the gain in hydroelectric power at the Lockport plant of $67,000 would leave a net loss of $541,000 over the 15-year period during which the 1-year diversion would have an effect. This is an annual loss of $36,000 which the committee considers to be infinitesimal in comparison to the $50 million a year estimated gross annual value of the output of the U.S. plants at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence" (p. 10, H. Rept. No. 191, 86th, 1st, "Diversion of Water from Lake Michigan").

4. DOES THE SUPREME COURT HAVE AUTHORITY TO INCREASE DIVERSION?

It is our understanding that the Supreme Court, in the case now pending before it, may have authority to increase the flow of water in the Illinois Waterway.

However, no constitutional lawyer of any consequence would say that this ousts Congress of its jurisdiction under the commerce clause. The Senate is not required to abdicate its power over navigation because a matter is pending before the Supreme Court, and in the famous Wheeling Bridge case the Congress specifically reversed a decree of the Court, and the Court ruled properly so.

Congress authorized this present diversion in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1950 and there is no argument that continued exercise of Court authority destroys the power of Congress.

There is no pleading now before the Court specifically asking for more water.

The Appalachian Power Co. case indicated Congress had the widest possible authority over navigable streams even though not used for navigation and there is no reason in law or conscience why Congress should neglect its proper functions out of an unwarranted deference to the Supreme Court.

Further, the Court, were it to increase diversion, would undoubtedly do so on a permanent basis. The passage of H.R. 1 would undoubtedly assist the master, through the proposed report, in arriving at valid conclusions.

Basically, the power of the Court and Congress are independent, Congress can foreclose the Court but the Court in this field cannot foreclose Congress. Until Congress ousts the Court of jurisdiction, their actions can be concurrent and there is no reason why either cannot act, being mindful of the fact that the power of Congress is paramount.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on another subject, yesterday my good friend, the senior Senator from Wisconsin in discussing the lake diversion bill stated, as appears on page 17373 of the RECORD, that apparently the lake diversion bill had its chief strength because of commitments which the dean of the Illinois delegation, the Honorable THOMAS J. O'BRIEN, had been able to obtain from Members of the Senate.

I do not know what the Senator from Wisconsin was seeking to prove by this, but the implication is clear. Let me say that both Representative O'BRIEN and I want this issue to be considered on its merits. I am very glad to acknowledge the help which Representative O'BRIEN has given. He has served in the House for 25 years, and he has won a deserved reputation for his fairness, for his integrity, and for his willingness to help other Members of the House and the Senate when their wishes coincide with the general welfare.

I am very happy that Representative O'BRIEN has thrown his great influence behind this bill, and this seems to me to strengthen the bill, and present a further argument in its defense rather than an objection to it.

I wish to pay tribute to the Representative for his long service and for his splendid work.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am sorry that the brilliant mind of the distinguished Senator from Illinois missed the point entirely. Without reflecting upon the distinguished congressional group in the House, we called attention to the fact that the bill which was reported "out"—and we will argue that late—is not the bill that was reported "in." It is not the bill the distinguished Representative from Illinois was discussing when he apparently firmed up a few of the Senators here who were in the House last year. Consequently, when we get to discussing the issue, which I have not discussed at all today, or yesterday, or the day before, I take exception to the remark that we are filibustering. I submit that if the Senator will look up the RECORD and count the time that was consumed by Senators who did not talk on the subject at all, the Senator will find that we have not taken half of the time they took.

FREE WORLD MUST ALERT ITSELF TO FAR EAST CRISIS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I want to get into the morning hour again so that I can put something else into the RECORD and not be accused of filibustering.

Mr. President, the step-up of aggressive acts by the Chinese Communists in the Far East is a serious danger sign, and, I believe, merits a "new alert" by the free world.

The acts of genocide reported in Tibet, itself, are enough to inflame the conscience of the world. Too, we find the Chinese Communists stirring up trouble on the India-Chinese border—in addition to the Red dragon's crisesmaking in Formosa and Laos.

DEALING WITH THE NEW CRISES

What can be done about this increasingly critical situation?

First of all, the United Nations—I would hope—would give a sympathetic ear to the pleas of the Dalai Lama and take a new look at Chinese aggression in Tibet.

Second, the Southeast Treaty Organization certainly must alert itself to the new dangers exemplified by these brazen, aggressive acts of the Chinese Communists. Naturally, it is difficult to attempt to predict when or where the Red Chinese aggressions may strike next—and in what force. However, in view of the Communist willingness to utilize military force to expand the Bamboo Curtain, the SEATO nations must be ready to withstand unjustified and unwarranted attack—any time or any place.

Third, the so-called uncommitted nations of the world—whether in southeast Asia or elsewhere—should now be able to correctly read the handwriting on the wall, as it reflects the true character of the ruthless, aggressiveness of the Communists—wherever it exists.

REASONS BEHIND COMMUNIST AGGRESSION

What are the reasons behind the Red Chinese barrage of military aggressive activity? Naturally, it is impossible to read the Communist mind or to get a periscope view of conditions behind the Bamboo Curtain. However, there is enough evidence available, I believe, to justify the following conclusions:

First, these actions are integral to the overall pattern of Communist aims for world domination. And second, and very important—the Communist regime is facing serious problems at home. Why? Among other things: First, the Red Chinese dragon has literally fallen on its face by failing to meet its own production goals; and second, the hard, uncompromising way in which the Communists are attempting to impose their atheistic, political and economic philosophy upon the Chinese people is resulting in serious disruption of home life among the Chinese, creating a condition contrary to traditions and still is not meeting the economic needs of the Chinese people.

In view of these problems, the Communist leaders may well consider it necessary to stir up trouble outside the Chinese borders to keep the Chinese people's minds off the Communist failures at home. The Red Chinese willingness to risk alienating India and other countries of Asia by flagrantly aggressive acts makes it seem reasonable to assume that China's home predicament and/or urge to expand are serious—and should be taken seriously by the rest of the world.

STRIKE OF OPERATING ENGINEERS AT CAPE CANAVERAL

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I was disturbed yesterday to receive several telegrams and telephone messages from contractors doing important construction work at Cape Canaveral, at the guided missile base in Florida, indicating that a complete shutdown of construction work had ensued there yesterday because of the striking of a very few operating engineers employed by one of the contractors, and because of the fact that they had picketed all construction operations.

I place in the RECORD at this time two of these telegrams, one from Edwin R. Brown, of the central Florida chapter of Associated General Contractors, at Orlando, Fla., and the other from Grover J. Carter, vice president of the Paul Smith Construction Co., both indicating that all construction operations were shut down by that relatively small strike.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORLANDO, FLA., August 31, 1959.
Senator SPESSARD HOLLAND,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

A picket placed today by members of Operating Engineers Union in dispute with B. B. McCormick Co., at Canaveral stopped all construction work at this vital defense installation. This is example of how union boycott against one company can cause loss of work for employees of many other companies and can paralyze industry. We urge you to fight for law against secondary boycotts.

EDWIN R. BROWN,
Central Florida Chapter,
Associated General Contractors.

ORLANDO, FLA., August 31, 1959.
Senator SPESSARD HOLLAND,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Am informed that our Cape Canaveral operation is shut down today because of strike against another company. Our national defense demands legislation which would prevent such irresponsibility on the part of union leadership.

GROVER J. CARTER,
Vice President,
Paul Smith Construction Co.

Mr. HOLLAND. I noted that the United Press International covered this subject yesterday in a dispatch from Cape Canaveral, reading as follows:

AUGUST 31, 1959.

CAPE CANAVERAL.—Several dozen members of the Operating Engineers Union (AFL–CIO) set up picket lines at the Air Force Missile Test Center today and halted construction activity at the base.

The Air Force indicated missile operations were not affected by the walkout, but a spokesman for the construction firm employing the strikers said, "We are crippled."

Officials said the strikers were members of local 673 of the Operating Engineers Union. No official estimate of the number of workers affected was immediately available.

An Air Force statement said "the majority of the building trades unions are supporting the strikers," but added that members of other unions reported for work.

The statement said only that the workers "began a strike this morning over alleged grievances." It did not specify the nature of the grievances.

The strikers are employed by the B. B. McCormick Construction Co. of Jacksonville Beach, Fla.

I note this morning another dispatch by United Press International, reading as follows:

SEPTEMBER 1, 1959.

CAPE CANAVERAL.—A negotiating session was planned today to settle a strike of union equipment operators whose walkout has crippled construction activities at the Air Force Missile Test Center.

Missile operations were not affected by yesterday's strike, officials said.

The firm employing the striking workers said a negotiation session was planned for some time today.

J. T. McCormick, president of the B. B. McCormick Construction Co., said the workers were demanding double time pay for overtime work.

Of course, at this distance and at this time we have no complete showing of the grounds of dispute, but I call attention to the fact that relatively few men, for some grievance, real or fancied, at this very time when the Congress of the United States is trying its best, at a conference of very dedicated men from both Houses, to reach some solution of the disturbing question of what should be done better to control the labor union situation, have assumed the responsibility of calling this strike in such a way as to completely shut down all construction activities at probably the most vital defense base in our Nation.

I hope that a better and more patriotic public relations philosophy will prevail among the union leaders and union members than that which seems to have dominated yesterday's strike, which is still continuing today, and is slowing down our Nation's defense program both by strike and by secondary boycott.

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF INVASION OF POLAND BY HITLER

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, just 20 years ago today an infamous event took place that shocked and stunned the world and violently altered the history of the world.

The infamous event of which I speak was, of course, the brutal and thoroughly unprovoked invasion of Poland by the armies of a ruthless madman, Adolph Hitler, on September 1, 1939. Despite the immediate reaction of the Western democracies in coming to the aid of their ally, the brute force of Hitler's well-trained and well-equipped military machine was simply too much, and Poland fell under the iron heel of tyranny.

The sickening stories of atrocities committed against the defiant people of Poland and against their homeland and cherished institutions are well known to the world and need not be repeated here. The stories of Poland's patriotic people will live as long as freedom is sought and guarded by man.

That day 20 years ago marked the beginning of what has been referred to as the war that would make the world safe for democracy. In a sense that has been true, but as we enjoy our many jealously guarded freedoms in this country, we should not forget that Poland—which suffered the initial onslaught of that great and devastating war—is still, 20 years later, without the freedoms that we consider basic to all human being.

For 20 years, the people of Poland have had to live under the dictates of a totalitarian government and have been ruled from a foreign land. First, it was Hitler and the Nazi occupation. Then Hitler was defeated, and the world rejoiced in its freedom from that brand of tyranny. But Poland was not spared for long. Next it was Stalin and a Communist rule from Moscow, which still holds the brave Polish people in bondage.

On this 20th anniversary of the invasion of Poland, we in this country should pause to reflect on the eternal patience that has been shown by our friends in that land. That they look to us for hope was amply demonstrated recently by the response to the visit of Vice President NIXON and the overwhelming reception he was accorded there. It was a warm display of sincere friendship that was especially meaningful when contrasted to the cool reception given a few weeks earlier to the Soviet Premier on his visit. It should serve to prove that the United States has a firm ally in the Polish people.

We should think back on this day that marks the beginning of the subjugation of the Polish people and reaffirm the friendship that exists between us. At the same time, may we look with hope to the inevitable day to come when Poland will once more be free.

ANNIVERSARY OF START OF WORLD WAR II— WHAT HAVE WE LEARNED?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on this the solemn anniversary of the beginning of World War II in Europe, remembering its legacy of over 10 million casualties, incalculable destruction of civilization's goods and values and its toll of the millions through genocide, we must at the very least recapitulate what we have learned. It seems to me that we have learned six fundamental truths:

First. Effective security requires effective defense, and effective defense must be organized in concert with the other free peoples.

Second. Demilitarization and disarmament including the reduction of nuclear armaments can proceed only under effective inspection and control through an international agency like the United Nations on a reciprocal step-by-step basis.

Third. The response to aggression by force of subversion is collective international action.

The best proof of the efficacy of collective action is the U.N. defense of the Republic of Korea.

Fourth. The peoples of the free world have a collective responsibility for the improvement of standards of living and of health, of those who live under less than tolerable standards; they have a responsibility too for an opportunity for peoples to have self determination as to how they shall be governed and to live under free institutions.

The best examples of that are found in our sympathy for the captive nations of northern and eastern Europe and in the U.N. trusteeships bringing former colonial areas peacefully into newly self-governing nationhood.

Fifth. World debate is the way in which to marshal the moral power of mankind for the resolution of causes of international tension.

Person-to-person programs, cultural, economic and sports exchanges and the open and public hearing afforded to statesmen as in the current impending Eisenhower-Khrushchev visits as well as U.N. debates are examples of this practice.

Sixth. The role of law through adjudications by the World Court, and perhaps tomorrow regional courts, of international disputes on legal issues is vital to world peace.

This movement is being led so effectively by the American Bar Association as an added tool in the search for peace.

All of this experience is being epitomized for us today in President Eisenhower's current trip to visit the great members of the free world family in Western Europe and in the impending exchange of visits with Khrushchev. The President has summed it up in these words:

> Indeed, I think the people want peace so much that one of these days governments better get out of their way and let 'em have it.

This is from the President's TV discussion with Prime Minister Macmillan yesterday.

IMPENDING VISIT OF NIKITA KHRUSHCHEV

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I now address myself to another subject on the same general theme, namely, Mr. Khrushchev's impending visit to the United States.

I deeply appreciate and sympathize fully with the disquiet of many about the Khrushchev visit here. There is no question about the fact that it is a visit fraught with dangers and that Khrushchev is likely to get more out of it than we are. For example, differences could be so bitter that it would worsen relations between the U.S.S.R. and ourselves; perhaps even worse, our people could be lulled into a sense of complacency which would be as horrible and false as the post-Munich spirit. Nor is the possibility of an accident to either participant to be discounted. Nor, finally, is the real moral taint which attaches to Khrushchev and all his works to be laid aside and glossed over under the guise of traditional American hospitality. Nonetheless compared to all of these real and grave dangers stand the President's words of yesterday:

> Well, this is something (peace) that lies so close to my own heart that any trouble that it is for me to come to any capital in Europe, including Moscow—I'm perfectly glad to do if it will advance something.

The President knows as we all do that notwithstanding all we have been able to do, all our successes and those of the free world, the situation is more tense today than ever in the fundamental sense that armament preparations in the nuclear fission and the H-fusion field are going forward more intensively than ever. The German Federal Republic with the heavy legacy of conscience carried by its people has learned this terrible lesson, too. Chancellor Adenauer in his letter of August 30 to Khrushchev says:

> The truly decisive question, which will determine the whole future of all of us, is that of all-out armament with conventional and nuclear weapons. It is devouring immeasurable sums, which would otherwise benefit the social and cultural advancement of mankind. Moreover, it is creating an atmosphere of tension such as precedes the outbreak of a devastating storm in nature.

Obviously, we have not yet found the way in which to break the continuity of the accelerated armaments race which has historically and inevitably led to war. The President is trying to find the way to break this terrible continuity—it is a new way, an untried way, a difficult and a dangerous way; yet on this the anniversary of World War II who would not support him at least in the effort? Take every precaution, yes, do not pretend a cordiality to Khrushchev certainly we do not feel, do not mislead the Communist regimes into thinking we approve in any way of them or condone in any way what they have done, or intend to lower our guard for an instant—to all of this, the lessons of World War II dictate a resounding "yes." But, to refrain from allowing Khrushchev with his obviously real hunger for a high level encounter with the President to make some constructive proposals himself if at all possible, to allow the people of the Soviet Union or of the world to believe that we are unwilling to listen or to talk, to lose the opportunity for presenting to the Russian people through President Eisenhower imaginative and courageous proposals for ending the cold war, definitely "no"—this would be defying the lessons of World War II.

We have the challenge and the opportunity now. We have touched greatness beginning with our military, economic and technical assistance programs since Greek-Turkish aid in 1947, with the Baruch-Hancock plan for disarmament in 1945, with the open skies proposals in 1955 and with the Berlin airlift in 1948 and the defense of Korea in 1950. The President's voice in the Soviet Union gives us another enormous opportunity. Let us not waste our strength in wishing that what is was not. Let us rather utilize our strength in the resourcefulness, the courage, the validity, and the boldness of our proposals.

DEATH OF DR. RAPHAEL LEMKIN

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to express my deep sorrow over the passing of a dear friend and a very great man, Dr. Raphael Lemkin.

Dr. Lemkin suffered the terrible experience of seeing his entire family, except for one brother, murdered by the Nazis. From then on, in the words of the New York Times, "the burden of his days was his crusade against slavery, degradation, and murder. It was a heavy burden, and last Friday it killed him, at the age of 58."

For 15 years he worked ceaselessly and tirelessly for the ratification by the nations of the world of the Genocide Convention to formally establish the criminal nature of persecution and attempted annihilation of national, ethnical, racial, or religious groups.

It was Dr. Lemkin who coined the term "genocide," a term which summed up in one word a monstrous crime which has left such a mark on our age.

I first met Raphael Lemkin when he was a consultant to the American delegation at the Nuremberg war crimes trials. I treasure the memories of a great many conversations with him at Nuremberg as well as his continued friendship and close association in the United States in subsequent years.

It was largely because of my association with him that I came to Washington in 1947 to testify before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to urge that the United States join in ratifying the Genocide Convention.

Largely through the efforts of this great man, almost 60 nations have now ratified the Genocide Convention. It was always a matter of deep regret to him and to me that the United States has remained outside the fold. The failure of our country to ratify this convention stands to our great discredit.

Dr. Lemkin's lifelong crusade was motivated by an intense hatred of tyranny of any kind. I know from my personal friendship with him that he abhorred communism and nazism with the same intensity. Unlike many in our time, Dr. Lemkin recognized that both nazism and communism were of the same cloth.

Knowing of his keen understanding and hatred of communism, I fear that his last days must have been anguished as he contemplated the preparations in this country to welcome Nikita Khrushchev, a man whose name and career are synonymous with genocide.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a New York Times editorial of August 31, 1959, and a Washington Post editorial of September 1, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 31, 1959]

RAPHAEL LEMKIN: CRUSADER

Diplomats of this and other nations who used to feel a certain concern when they saw the slightly stooped figure of Dr. Raphael Lemkin approaching them in the corridors of the United Nations need not be uneasy any more. They will not have to think up explanations for a failure to ratify the Genocide Convention for which Dr. Lemkin worked so patiently and so unselfishly for a decade and a half. Government by government, until the number of ratifications approached three score, this devoted man did more than any other individual to win formal acceptance of the principle that it is criminal to injure or destroy national, ethnical, racial, or religious groups.

Raphael Lemkin, once a successful lawyer in Warsaw, had suffered the loss of all his family, except one brother, at the hands of the Nazis. In this country he had a distinguished career as a teacher, lecturer, and writer, but the burden of his days was his crusade against slavery, degradation, and murder. It was a heavy burden, and last Friday it killed him, at the age of 58.

Death in action was his final argument—a final word to our own State Department, which has feared that an agreement not to kill would infringe our sovereignty.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 1, 1959]

RAPHAEL LEMKIN

Dr. Raphael Lemkin, a survivor of the Nazi attempt to exterminate the intellectual and cultural identity of the Polish people, dedicated the remainder of his life to recognition of this kind of mass murder as a crime under international law. In a distinguished work of scholarship, "Axis Rule in Occupied Europe," he coined the term "genocide" to designate such planned extermination. His extraordinary zeal and eloquence had much to do with the approval of a Genocide Convention by the United Natons General Assembly in 1948—a convention endorsed by 56 nations, the United States, lamentably, not among them. In this country which had been his home ever since he left his native Poland in 1941 he carved a notable career as a professor of international law at Duke, Yale, Rutgers, and Princeton Universities. His life was symbolic, in a sense, of the invincibility of the human spirit; and his death on Sunday ended a career which contributed significantly to the growth of world law.

HIGH HONORS WON BY AMERICANS AT INTERNATIONAL CERAMIC SHOW

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the American Craftsmen's Council recently announced that the U.S. exhibit of 73 ceramics sent to the Second International Congress of Contemporary Ceramics at Ostend, Belgium, had won the Grand Prix des Nations. In addition, the council reported that American entries received more gold and silver medals than any of the 24 other countries represented.

Instrumental in forging this splendid record were a number of New Yorkers, led by Mr. David Weinrib of Stony Point, N.Y. Mr. Weinrib received a gold medal for his contribution to the show.

I am proud to report that a number of other New York craftsmen—11 in number—also participated in this important ceramic exhibition. They included the following:

Fong Chow, New York; James A. Crumrine, New York; Hui Ka Kwong, New York; Ted Bielefeld, Port Chester; Dean Maxfield Mullavey, Port Chester; Val M. Cushing, Alfred; Theodore Randall, Alfred; Robert Turner, Alfred Station; Frans Wildenhain, Pittsford; and James and Philip Secrest, Canandaigua.

I salute each of these artists for their work and their part in the excellent American showing. I also commend the American Craftsmen's Council, which has its headquarters in New York City, for its part. The council, which has contributed so much to the American art scene, and has served to inspire so many fine craftsmen in this country, arranged the U.S. exhibit in Ostend at the request of the U.S. Information Agency. When the Ostend exhibition ends in October the American pieces will go on a tour of Europe.

Mr. President, although the outstanding performance of our craftsmen at this ceramics exhibition is of course secondary to the overall importance of the show to art in our world today, I am delighted that our representatives fared so well. Our showing is indeed, as David R. Campbell, president of the American Craftsmen's Council has written me, "a job well done—by European standards as well as our own." It is another exemplification of the high standards of excellence, ingenuity and talent so many Americans are today exhibiting in the world of art.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SENATE CONFEREES ON S. 1555, THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—RESOLUTIONS PLACED ON CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, if there is no further morning business, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate Senate Resolution 180 and Senate Resolution 181, and that they take their regular places on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 180) giving certain instructions to the Senate conferees on the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 181) giving certain instructions to the Senate conferees on the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

MEETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I have today sent a letter to the Vice President enclosing a report, required by Public Law 86–42, on the record meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group which was held in Montreal and Ottawa, Canada, on June 25–28, 1959. This report supplements an informal report which I made in the Senate on July 8 and contains a financial record of expenditures of the delegation to the June meeting. Copies of it are available at the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss my conclusions thus far about the activities of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group because they are set forth in this report. I would like to put them in the RECORD, however, at this point in my remarks, and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that I may do that.

There being no objection, the conclusions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCLUSIONS OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE DELEGATION

1. The June 1959 meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group fully justifies the hopes of the sponsors of Public Law 86–42 which authorized "participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences with Canada." The discussion of common goals and problems by legislators of the two countries clearly promotes better relations. The activities of the group have received favorable comment in the press and elsewhere in both the United States and Canada.

2. The procedural arrangements which have been agreed upon—private, off-the-record discussions, a minimum of staff and experts, and a single agreed statement to the press at the end—have contributed to the success of the meetings. Twenty-four delegates on each side is probably the maximum useful number. The desirability of having as many legislators as possible benefit from the interchange of ideas with their counterparts from Canada must be balanced against the desirability of frankness and specificity in the talks, which is made easier in a small group.

3. I discerned no conflict between the activities of legislators from the two countries meeting for the currently understood purposes, on the one hand, and the function of diplomatic and other official intercourse between the two Governments on the other hand. The Department of External Affairs of Canada and the Department of State have been kept fully informed of the activities of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, the Secretary of State of Canada, Mr. Howard Green, and the American Ambassador to Canada, Mr. Richard B. Wigglesworth, entertained the parliamentary delegates of both countries during our visit in Canada.

4. It is probably too much to expect that legislators interested in the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group will be able to carry on much work between meetings of the group. It has been agreed that there will be no joint full-time staff for the group. Except for a nucleus of members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, there may be little continuity of membership, on the American side at least, from meeting to meeting. Members of both Legislatures are, of course, extremely busy with their own legislative responsibilities throughout the year. Therefore, no elaborate collection of data or studies by the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group between its meetings should be anticipated. I would suggest, however, that members of congressional committees dealing with matters of common interest to the United States and Canada would find it very helpful to meet with their counterparts in the Canadian Parliament as much as possible.

It would also be to the advantage of our Members of Congress to visit joint defense installations and agricultural and mineral-producing areas, as well as those areas along the boundary where water problems exist. Firsthand inspection of such places will make us better able to deal with legislation of mutual concern.

5. Looking ahead to the next meeting of the group, perhaps in the early spring in Washington, agenda topics should be selected at a relatively short time prior to the next meeting so that—as was the case with the June 1959 meeting—the subjects on the agenda will be of current interest and substantial importance.

FISCAL STABILITY

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on countless occasions I have stood before this body and elsewhere to speak about the dangers of inflation which, together with the menace of international communism, form the greatest double-barrel threat to this country's survival. Unfortunately, Mr. President, there still exists an element which advocates that a little inflation is a healthy situation.

In a column which was published in the Boston Sunday Herald of August 30, Sylvia Porter presents an objective analysis on what fiscal stability means to the average citizen. I believe this fine columnist performs a distinct public service with an accurate portrayal of this problem and I ask unanimous consent that her column, entitled "Your Money's Worth—Signs of Stability Seen in Dollar's Buying Power," be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOUR MONEY'S WORTH—SIGNS OF STABILITY SEEN IN DOLLAR'S BUYING POWER

(By Sylvia Porter)

Let's say that America is on the threshold of a new cycle of stable living costs. What would this mean to you?

There are provocative signs that the forces which have spurred a leapfrogging of prices ever since the start of World War II finally are losing steam. Propelling us toward a new phase of reasonable stability in the dollar's buying power are such factors as: a balanced Federal budget, restraint on credit, intense competition among U.S. businessmen, soaring competition from foreign imports of goods, the vast, new productive capacity of our industries and of foreign corporations too, a mounting consciousness of inflation's evils throughout the Western World.

Let's say, then, that this impressive combination of forces does make price stability a reality at last. What would this mean?

TO YOU AS A SAVER OF DOLLARS

It would permit you to save dollars with confidence that they will have just about as much buying power a couple of years from today as today. You could buy high-grade bonds paying you a fixed annual income or deposit your cash in a savings account and be satisfied that the income you earn on the savings would much more than cover any gentle rise in the price level.

TO YOU AS A PERSON LOOKING FORWARD TO A PENSION

You could dismiss the gnawing fear that the pension being accumulated for you which appears adequate now might be painfully inadequate a few years from now. You could build a financial retirement program on the basis of your social security with assurance that the program would allow you to live out your senior years in dignity.

TO YOU AS A HOLDER OR BUYER OF STOCKS

An era of stable prices would let the corporation in which you are an owner plan properly and intelligently for a normal, sustained growth in production, sales, and profits. It could base its expansion plans on its belief in the Nation's future prosperity instead of on its dread of future inflation of costs. You could buy and hold stocks as an investment anticipating a share in your country's sound growth rather than as a gambler anticipating a share in its unsound speculative bubbles.

TO YOU AS A HOME BUYER

A steady dollar would help end today's feverish and dangerous speculation in land and real estate. It would give you a chance to buy more quality and quantity of house with your housing dollar.

TO YOU AS A SMALL BUSINESSMAN

Stable prices would give you a better chance to survive. You've been at a heavy disadvantage because you haven't had the cash or borrowing power to load up on goods as bigger firms have and thus you've not been able to benefit from the periodic "windfalls" of inflationary price rises. Steady prices would cut your competitive disadvantage.

TO YOU AS A HOUSEWIFE

You could pass on to your family the benefits of its rising income. No longer would you be under the destructive strain of trying to manage in a period of ever-rising prices and of knowing your choices are to reduce your family's standards or nag your husband for more money.

TO YOU AS A WAGE OR SALARY EARNER

You wouldn't see your extra pay dollars disappearing into extra living costs. You could get off the treadmill and could really move up the living standard ladder as your paycheck rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of Calendar No. 817, House bill 1.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CRIME AND ENFORCED INTEGRATION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the September 7, 1959, issue of Newsweek magazine contains two extremely interesting articles, one entitled "Massacre in New York," and the second entitled "Epidemic in Washington."

The article "Massacre in New York" relates how two rival gangs, one of Negro youths and the other of Puerto Rican youths, erupted in one of the worst gang wars in Manhattan's lower east side history. Four died and 15 were hospitalized as a result of knifings, gunshot, or bludgeon wounds.

I believe it would be a fair question to ask the proponents of integration why, in the city of New York, where integration has been practiced for years, and where many statutes prevail on the books to enforce integration, are there gangs of youths who, in the midst of all this legal integration, have segregated themselves into such hate gangs? I believe it is a fair question for proponents of civil rights legislation to ponder before they vote to force more integration upon more unwilling people in our country.

The article "Epidemic in Washington" describes the National Capital as "a crime-infested morass in a miasma of brutality." This is one of our leading national magazine's description of our once universally beloved Capital City.

This article relates the cold statistics of crime in Washington, and reiterates the appalling incident recently involving Representative CHARLES DIGGS, JR., of Michigan, a Negro Member of Congress. The article quotes Representative DIGGS as saying, "I know that there are certain conditions which produce this kind of antisocial attitude."

Mr. President, there are many Members of the Congress who knew in advance that the practice of forcing integration upon people would produce this kind of antisocial attitude. However, there were, and there still are, people in high office who insist that forced integration has nothing to do with the crime rate, the immorality rate, and the general rate of decline of respect for law enforcement found in large cities where integration is forced on people against their will.

I hope every Member of the Senate will read these two articles and ponder the grave question raised by these statistics and these descriptions of conditions in America's largest city and in America's National Capital, two places where forced integration has been experimented with more than any other places in the United States. I ask that they heavily weigh these facts before they go forward to vote for more civil rights legislation that will force integration upon other areas in the Nation where it is not wanted.

I ask unanimous consent that these two articles be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASSACRE IN NEW YORK

It started as the week started, and when the chill rain ceased and the heat became fierce again, it spread like a dread contagion. At first, the Sportsmen, mostly Negro, and the Forsyth Street Boys, mostly Puerto Rican, breached a 3-year truce to launch a deadly rumble in Manhattan's Lower East Side. Next, violence flared in Brooklyn and in the Bronx, and in Jamaica, where the Chaplains, Sinners, Bishops, and Cheyennes fight to the death for territorial rights. At the weekend the West Side of midtown Manhattan erupted. The week's toll in New York City's interminable teenage gang wars: Four dead; at least 15 hospitalized with serious knife, gunshot, or bludgeon wounds. Two of those slain were 16; one, 15, and a girl; one 14.

Among the gang arsenals seized by police in the aftermath were zip guns, switch-blade knives, daggers, blackjacks, chains, lengths of iron pipe, meat cleavers, and a sword cane.

Julio Rosario, 14, was an active combatant when war broke out anew between his Forsyth Street Boys and the Sportsmen as the week began. Two days later he died in a hospital, of knife wounds in the back. Theresa Gee was simply getting some fresh air on a doorstep when one of a fusillade of .22-caliber bullets killed her instantly. Her 17-year-old slayer, leader of the Forsyth Boys, was quickly apprehended and offered only one appalling excuse. "I didn't know I was shooting a girl," he said.

As the week ended, Robert Young and Anthony Kerzenski, both 16, were sitting with friends on a bench in an unlighted Hell's Kitchen playground after a movie, when the assailants struck, yelling, "No gringos in the park."

Bleeding from stab wounds, Young and Kerzenski staggered to the nearby apartments of friends. Both fell dead as they crossed the threshold. An 18-year-old companion, Ewald Riemer, stabbed in the abdomen, was rushed to a hospital where his condition was listed as satisfactory. Harold Luken, 16, was treated at a hospital for injuries suffered when he was struck on the head with a bottle during the melee.

The survivors estimated that their knife-wielding, bottle-brandishing attackers had barely reached their teens.

TIME OF MOURNING

The deaths of Julio Rosario and Theresa Gee turned the Feast of St. Augustine, normally a gay and festive occasion for the members of St. Augustine's Chapel of Trinity (Episcopal) Parish on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, into a time of solemn prayer and mourning.

Instead of dancing in the streets until well past midnight, more than 200 men, women, and children, led by the Reverend C. Kilmer Myers, held a solemn procession. They walked through block after block in double file, in slow, measured steps, bearing aloft a statue of St. Augustine and carrying lighted candles. And, wherever they went, they handed out leaflets, in English and Spanish: "The people of St. Augustine's Chapel ask you to join them in public prayer that God will reconcile us, one to another, and bring an end to fear and hatred."

But even before Julio Rosario was buried, the phone rang in the home of his grief-stricken parents, and a threat was made that his brother would be "knocked over next."

And while the prayers of Trinity Parish still echoed in the East Side, Robert Young and Anthony Kerzenski died 3 miles to the west.

EPIDEMIC IN WASHINGTON

To the tourist, Washington, D.C., was still the same inspiring city of monumental buildings, tree-lined avenues, and statue-studded parks, exuding an atmosphere of pride in history and confidence in the future.

To its alarmed residents, however, the Capital of the United States was beginning to look last week more and more like a crime-infested morass in a miasma of brutality.

In the first 6 months of the year, the crime rate had rocketed 15.3 percent and juvenile crime, over a 12-month period, had increased by 25 percent, compared with a national average of 6.5. Washington, which ranked only ninth in population among the Nation's cities, was 6th in murder, 4th in aggravated assault, 12th in forcible rape.

Muggings had become so widespread that not even the most fashionable neighborhoods were immune.

The experience of Rosina Quarles, widow of Deputy Defense Secretary Donald Quarles, was typical. Mrs. Quarles was waiting for her car on the well-lighted corner of 29th Street and Woodley Road in a fashionable section of Washington. "A boy came out of nowhere like a flash," she recalled from her bed in Walter Reed Hospital. "He hit me and I hit the sidewalk."

The hoodlums seemed to have little fear of police. On the alert for members of a gang that had slain an Air Force sergeant when he caught them looting his car, Patrolman William Maginnis stopped a man for questioning.

"All of a sudden * * * the man swung around and hit me in the mouth with a bottle," Maginnis said later. "I had him nearly subdued when someone hit me on the head from behind."

Maginnis recovered consciousness in a hospital. He was one of nearly 150 officers assaulted since January of this year. There were 26 such attacks in July alone.

"We saw a man being kicked and beaten," reported Representative CHARLES DIGGS, JR., of Michigan recently. "We yelled at them to stop * * *. Then a couple of them, one with a knife, came toward us and we drove away to call police."

The assailants were a gang of Negro toughs. Next day Representative DIGGS, a liberal Democrat and himself a Negro, said: "I know that there are certain conditions which produce this kind of antisocial attitude, but we need more responsibility on the part of the Negro community, too. We can't just blame conditions and let it go at that."

THE REASONS WHY

DIGGS was aware that in recent years Negroes had been pouring into integrated Washington as fast as whites moved to the suburbs of Maryland and northern Virginia, until they constituted 54 percent of an estimated 1 million population. And he also knew that the crime rate had increased apace. But there were other basic reasons for the epidemic of violence.

For one, the voteless District of Columbia, governed by Congress through a Board of Commissioners, was limited by congressional act to only 2,500 policemen. (New York, with about eight times the population has nearly 10 times the number of police, and needs more.)

For another, Congress had authorized only one juvenile court judge, and he was so swamped that of 2,116 delinquency cases in the past fiscal year, 948 had been swept under the carpet without so much as a court hearing. (One of the suspects arrested for the attack witnessed by DIGGS was a 16-year-old who had been awaiting trial 8 months on a mugging charge.)

What would Congress, traditionally indifferent to District of Columbia woes, do about the increasingly critical situation?

Last week, as the Senate Appropriations Committee ended hearings on the Capital's crime wave, Chairman CARL HAYDEN of Arizona said: "I think a pretty good showing was made for more police."

But most Congressmen were preoccupied with other matters and hope of early adjournment, and few, even of those who expressed concern, spoke with the urgency of Representative DIGGS. Apparently he was right: "You don't really understand it until you see it * * *."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPATRIATION OF KOREAN NATIONALS BY JAPAN

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I am sure that all the Members of the Senate recall with pride the great sacrifice for freedom American boys made on the battlefields of Korea. It is one of the proudest chapters in our history. Their heroism and blood—and the treasure of America—were poured out in full measure to halt the unprovoked aggression of the North Korean Communists against the Republic of Korea. And we must not forget in this era of so-called relaxed tensions between the free world and the Soviet Union that the aggressors in that tragic war were aided and abetted in no small measure with arms, munitions, soldiers, and technical assistance from Communist China.

America and the United Nations, in unison with the heroic soldiers of the Republic of Korea, did halt the challenge of North Korean aggression—but only at a terrible price.

I am sure that Members of the Senate would react with grave concern if anything was done by the free world which might—even indirectly—serve to build up the armed strength of North Korea which has been branded as an aggressor by the United Nations.

There are roughly 60,000 American boys in uniform stationed in the friendly nation of South Korea. They are there to insure continued peace in this troubled land, to insure one of the most heroic allies this Nation has ever had that its future will be secure.

Recent press announcements have carried the news that the Japanese Red Cross and the North Korean Red Cross, operating under the guidance of the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, signed an agreement in Calcutta making it possible for those Koreans living in Japan who wish to return to North Korea to do so.

Now, Mr. President, when I first heard about this, I was determined to investigate the matter fully—not only because I could not, in good conscience, remain silent if Koreans were being forcibly returned to North Korea, but because my genuine affection for the South Korean Government automatically prompts me to defend their cause in these perilous times.

This is a matter in which two very stanch allies of the United States are involved and one, therefore, which must be considered with strict impartiality and without emotion.

The State Department has assured me that any repatriation that is undertaken under this agreement will be on a strictly voluntary basis; that there will be no enforced deportation of Korean nationals to either North or South Korea; as a matter of fact, they have assured me that the Japanese Government is perfectly willing to allow those Koreans who wish to remain in Japan to do so.

The North Korean Communist government, naturally, is conducting a campaign, backed by Peiping and Moscow, to encourage Koreans resident in Japan to return to North Korea. However, since the International Committee of the Red Cross has agreed to see to it that those returning are returning by free choice, it is my hope that the pressures and propaganda of the North Korean Communists will not be successful in sabotaging this repatriation program.

The Japanese Government, one of the stanchest outposts of freedom in the Pacific, has given its assurances that free choice will be insisted upon in this program—that there will be no enforced deportation of unwilling Korean nationals. The International Committee of the Red Cross has agreed to oversee this operation and apprise those Koreans involved of their rights of free choice under the agreement. But we must never underestimate the tactics of the Communists. There is no doubt that attempts will be made to frustrate the purpose of this repatriation program.

I am sure all my colleagues will agree that it is incumbent upon us to watch this program carefully. If there is any evidence whatever that the Communist North Koreans are attempting to deny basic rights to those Koreans who wish to return to South Korea, or are attempting to make a mockery of the good offices of the International Red Cross, then, as the allies of the Japanese and South Korean people, it is our duty to expose their activities.

Mr. President, in dealing with the Communists, a suspicious nature is a must. I share the concern of our heroic wartime allies, the South Koreans. I also have faith in our Japanese friends and the International Red Cross. To them both I want to say that I, for one, will not remain silent if the North Korean Communists attempt to go back on their solemn agreement to allow free choice to reign supreme in the repatriation of Korean nationals from Japan to the Korean Peninsula.

STEEL PROFITS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, when on August 19 Secretary of Labor Mitchell presented his report, "Background Statistics Bearing on the Steel Dispute," I commended him for having issued it, stating that it would have "general usefulness." At the same time, however, I observed that it contained certain deficiencies which I planned to discuss at a later date. On August 20 I did discuss one of these deficiencies—his handling of the figures on productivity—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 20, 1959, pages 16541–16543. Now I wish to discuss Secretary Mitchell's treatment of profits. This is a difficult field of analysis in which the Department of Labor has no particular expertise. It is regrettable that in presenting data in this unfamiliar area the Department has unwittingly, I am sure, followed procedures which seriously impair its findings.

The profit data in Secretary Mitchell's report are presented in the form of charts showing profits as a percent of revenue—or sales—and as a percent of stockholders' equity—or net worth. In the former the trend is slightly downward, and in the latter distinctly downward.

Except for one chart which includes the year 1940, the trend lines begin with 1947 and end with 1958. The year 1947, of course, was a period of pronounced steel shortages and followed hard on the heels of the repeal of the excess profits tax, the effect of which of course was to result in a sharp rise in profits after taxes. Beginning a trend line in a year such as that and ending it with the recession year of 1958 would almost inevitably produce the impression of a general decline in profits. I recognize that by the use of small dots the report does show profit levels in the first half of this year. Members of the general public to whom this report is addressed can certainly be excused if they fail to recognize the significance of these rather inconspicuous dots.

But the principal basis for criticizing the handling of the profit data lies in the fact that the report ignores the effect on profit rates of the level of steel production as a percent of capacity, or the operating rate, as it is termed. It is a matter of demonstrated fact that in the steel industry profits are determined to a very considerable extent by the operating rate. To show that the industry had a lower profit rate in a recession year, such as 1958, than in a year of high production does not in any way indicate a decline in the industry's profitability. This can only be determined by using methods of analysis which take the variations in the operating rate into account. The simplest of these methods is to compare profits in 2 years of roughly similar operating rates.

I have had prepared a comparison of this type between the first half of 1959 and 1953, both periods of high production. Profits are compared on the basis of three measures: Profits as a percent of net worth, profits as a percent of sales, and profits per ton of finished steel shipped. They are presented for the industry's four largest companies—United States Steel, Bethlehem, Republic, and Jones & Laughlin:

	Operating rate	Profits (after taxes)
		Per ton shipped	As percent of—
			Net worth	Sales
United States Steel:
1953	98.4	$8.85	9.9	5.7
1959 (1st half)	87.3	18.88	16.7	10.1
Bethlehem Steel:
1959 (1st half)	90.9	15.95	15.1	8.5
Republic Steel:
1959 (1st half)	87.9	16.74	18.8	8.6
Jones & Laughlin Steel:
1953	96.0	7.25	9.9	4.9

[1] Not available.

As between these two periods of high operating rates, there occurred in this relatively short span of 6 years, sharp increases for each company in each of these measures of profitability. In the case of United States Steel, its profits per ton more than doubled; its profits as a percent of net worth increased over 60 percent; and its profits as a percent of sales nearly doubled. For the steel industry as a whole, profits as a percent of net worth rose from 11.2 percent in 1953 to 15 percent in the first half of 1959. The general showing is therefore not one of decreasing profitability, as might be inferred from the Secretary's report, but of increasing profitability.

In addition to his failure to relate profit rates to operating rates, Secretary Mitchell also used a statistical measure which significantly understates the level of profits in the steel industry. The industry category which he uses for his profit figures, "primary iron and steel," includes not only steel companies but firms in a number of other industries which are separate and apart from the steel industry. These other industries are principally "gray-iron foundries," "malleable iron foundries," and "steel foundries." By comparison with the steel industry they are distinctly small business industries, numbering over 1,500 separate firms and having an average value added by manufacture in 1954 of less than $1 million per company, as compared to approximately $40 million per company for the steel industry.

In the aggregate, however, they represent about one-fifth of the value of primary iron and steel. Since foundries tend to be highly competitive and have been adversely affected by substitute products, it is not surprising that their inclusion tends to depress the profit rate of the industry group used by Secretary Mitchell. In 1957, for example, the profit rate as a percent of net worth for primary iron and steel was 11.4 percent. This, however, was an average of a higher figure for steel companies alone of 12.4 percent and a lower figure for the foundries of 8 percent. The profit rate used by Secretary Mitchell was actually 11.1 percent, but this is based on stockholders' equity at the end of the year. The figures presented here, like those for the steel industry as published by the Federal Trade Commission, are based on the average of stockholders' equity at the beginning and end of the year.

The title of Secretary Mitchell's report, it will be remembered, is "Background Statistics Bearing on the Steel Dispute." It is unfortunate that in presenting his figures on profits he uses a measure which is biased downward by the inclusion of companies that are not parties to the steel dispute nor even part of the steel industry.

Mr. President, while I have been somewhat critical of certain aspects of the Secretary's report, I wish again to compliment him for his foresight and energy in having had it prepared. It contains a great deal of information which is useful, pertinent and accurate. My remarks of today and last week were motivated not out of any animus toward the Secretary, whom I hold in the highest esteem, nor out of any partisanship to the cause of labor. They were motivated simply by my conviction that a price reduction in the steel industry is not only desirable but necessary to protect the consuming public against further inroads of inflation. The question of whether there is room for a price reduction will hinge very largely on these two issues of productivity and profits. I hope that my remarks will constitute at least a small contribution toward greater understanding of these two complex issues.

THE NAZIS' ATTACK ON POLAND 20 YEARS AGO—A TRIBUTE TO POLISH COURAGE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared relating to the attack on Poland 20 years ago by the Nazis.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

The date of September 1 will be remembered in history for a tragic affair: the invasion of Poland by Nazi Germany under Hitler in 1939. Today, 20 years after that terrible Friday morning, we can see that the fate of the United States and of the world was tied up in that event.

I think it is good to remember, Mr. President, that Poland was a victim of the Molotov-Ribbentrop nonaggression pact and that but for this assurance that Russian troops would be "quiet on the eastern front," Hitler would not have dared extend his lines to the east and to expose his western flank. I don't want to use any sort of hindsight here to say what might have been done, but I do want to emphasize that free Poland was the first country to resist the encroachment of Nazi Germany and she suffered for her courage. Twenty years ago in the ruins of Warsaw, I'm certain the good Polish people would never have dreamed that in 1959 on September 1, there would still be bomb scars to remind them of that day and that their history would have been so tragically changed in one generation.

There is no need for me to recall how the gallant Polish farmers, workers, and soldiers tried to stem the tide of Nazi tanks, and how the people of Warsaw were the first to learn of saturation bombing as carried out by Luftwaffe Stukas. The entire resources of a proud and fierce nation were marshaled against the most powerful war machine in Europe. We learned the meaning of the word "blitzkrieg." But I do not want to stop with the year 1939, but to go on to our present date, September 1, 1959.

The Polish people have only recently been able to start slow recovery from the crushing effect of the German occupation and the subsequent oppression of the Stalin era. When, today, we talk with Polish intellectuals and Members of the Diet, when we understand the depth of student and cultural exchange programs, when we read Polish books and see Polish films, then we can begin to comprehend the true soul of this nation, enslaved so many times during its long history.

And this can help us to understand Poland today. We must never forget that September 1, 1939, marked the beginning of World War II and we have obligations stemming from the outcome of that conflict. We must place on the agenda of all international East-West meetings the freedom of the captive nations of Eastern Europe, and we must open our doors to their refugees—particularly, to those who have been homeless since that day in September of 1939. It is time we looked at our immigration laws from this point of view, and it is time we recognized the shame of deporting refugees of good character to Poland rather than allowing them to stay in our land. America has been enriched and made stronger by the immigration of people from Poland.

To offer encouragement to the Polish people we should extend to them economic assistance, quantities of our food and fiber, and engage in exchange programs. As a symbol of our friendship it would be well to provide funds for a children's hospital such as I have proposed in the form of an amendment to the mutual security appropriation bill. We must realize that Poland's western border—on the Oder-Niesse River—is a historical and traditional boundary, and that we should take steps to recognize this line as the boundary of postwar Poland.

A tremendous change has taken place in Poland since 1956, and we should do all we can in the best interests of the Polish people to encourage for them a greater measure of freedom. We must visibly demonstrate our belief in the importance of Poland and the other countries of Eastern Europe as nations in their own right, and we should do all possible to keep our faith with the peoples of these countries.

THE LITERARY APPROACH IN FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in recent months there have been many unfortunate and inaccurate allegations published in books and magazines. Riots have been inspired and ill feeling toward the United States is often generated by these publications. I realize that there is no medium of communication, including the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which can begin to reach the enormous public that these magazines serve. However, even though it is a futile gesture, I wish to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the copy of a letter recently addressed to the editor of Time magazine by Dr. Frederic H. Young, of New Jersey, who recently served as a professor in India. The letter speaks for itself and is but further proof of what all of us know about the nature of the dramatic and flamboyant allegations which continue to appear in our press.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UPPER MONTCLAIR, N.J., August 11, 1959.

Senator FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I knew you would be interested in the copy below of a letter to the editor of Time. Have sent copies to Premier Nehru, Sri Radhakrishnan, vice chancellors at the universities in India where I was visiting professor, and the U.S. Educational Foundation in New Delhi. Again, let me say we enjoyed meeting you and Mrs. Fulbright at the reception in New Delhi last October.

Ever yours,

FREDERIC H. YOUNG.

AUGUST 9, 1959.

The EDITOR OF TIME MAGAZINE,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: As a Fulbright professor of philosophy to Indian universities, including Calcutta (my host university), Poona, Punjab, Kerala, Madras, Bombay, Jadavpur, and Baroda, and who has recently returned to America a few months ago, I was disturbed deeply by the item, "Factories of Futility" under "Education," in the August 10 issue of Time. In justice I must object sharply in respect of one or two points.

In general the report on the situation in higher education in India is correct; there is a critical condition indeed in the universities with respect to pressure for admission, and with regard to the lack of opportunities for professional employment after graduation. My objections are specific; namely, the reference to "badly trained professors," and to Calcutta University as "so completely a factory that it runs classes in three shifts a day." Both of these statements (with full recognition of their contexts), bear the aspect of superficial generalization.

The reference to "badly trained professors" is unfortunate, since, though there are no doubt some in that category, the professors in philosophy whom I met were some of the finest trained and intellectually gifted men I have met in any universities around the globe. There should have been more qualifications connected with the phrase (after all, we have enough of "badly trained professors" here, and their number is increasing).

As for Calcutta University being a factory—well, is this any less true of some of our American metropolitan universities, who also virtually run classes in three shifts.

Finally, I found in philosophy that the students were anything but perfunctory in response—seminars and discussions after my lectures would run from 3 to 4 hours. And the lectures by Indian professors whom I heard, were the opposite of mechanical. Now I know the danger of generalizing from my experience in philosophy, to a view of the total university situation in India. But I am equally conscious of the same danger, or rather, the mistake, of generalizing without proper qualifying statements, which mistake has been committed in "Factories of Futility."

Mrs. Young and I came home with much respect and affection for the Indian people. They have vast and critical problems in all aspects of their national life. They deserve our most sympathetic understanding, but we cannot indulge in reports which, however unintentionally, are unjust in their effect.

Sincerely,

Dr. FREDERIC H. YOUNG,
Fulbright Professor of Philosophy to India, New Jersey State College, Upper Montclair, N.J.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point an article entitled "The Ugly Cult," by Ernest K. Lindley, in Newsweek magazine of August 31, 1959, and a copy of a letter from Edward S. Prentice of Palo Alto, Calif., to Roy W. Howard, president of Scripps-Howard newspapers.

Mr. Lindley succinctly points out six mistakes which we are making in our approach to foreign relations. Among the most serious of these mistakes in my judgment—and apparently in Mr. Lindley's also—is the sensational type of journalism and pseudojournalism exemplified by the Colegrove articles on Vietnam and the book, "The Ugly American," which I am sure will lose none of its sensationalism in its adaptation for the screen.

One of the most unfortunate results of books and articles of this kind is that they divert attention from the real problems we face and lead us to fritter away our energies in disputes among ourselves and over matters which are not peculiar to the foreign program but are rather typical of our governmental administration. Our mass media bear an enormous responsibility for this state of affairs. Mr. Lindley is one of too few voices crying in the wilderness. I am pessimistic of our ability to do the things which we imperatively must do so long as so much of the information reaching the public misses the point and confuses rather than clarifies the real issues.

There being no objection, the article and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UGLY CULT

(By Ernest K. Lindley)

Against the ominous backdrop of the Communist aggression against Laos, I should like to point to some of the mistakes we are making, or seem to be slipping toward, in the struggle for Asia. By "we" I mean not just our Government, or parts of it, but unofficial Americans. And I am not concerned here with past mistakes. The favorable tide I found on my recent survey of 17 Asian nations and colonies exists in spite of them. My concern is about current and possible future mistakes that might reverse this tide:

1. The worst general mistake is to pay attention to such a preposterous book as "The Ugly American," a grotesque cartoon of a few misfits and errors of the past. Some of its suggestions for improving American operations in Asia are out of date—already having been put into effect. Some are ridiculous. At the same time, it ignores some of the things Asians most need from us. As a result, anyone who takes this book seriously is misinformed about the present situation and badly advised as to the future. (For an informed American's critique, see the article by Thomas W. Wilson, Jr., in Harper's for June.)

Few free Asians I saw on this trip had read this book. They were too intelligent to take it seriously, although some remarked that it furnished propaganda for our common enemies and one noted that it was insulting to Asians. The distinguished Thai editor, Kukrit Pramoj, has written an urbane reply (with implied reference also to Graham Greene's "The Quiet American"). He calls it: The Loud and Beautiful American. Due to appear in the September issue of Pacifica, it deserves an audience throughout America.

It is the effect of "The Ugly American" on Americans, including some of Congress and certain sections of the press, which disturbs a U.S. observer just returned from Asia. One shudders to think how many more people, here and throughout the world, may be misled by the movie version.

2. Sensational journalism in "The Ugly American" vein. A recent series of largely unverified charges concluded that our aid program in South Vietnam is a "fiasco." Even if every charge were true—which is not the case—the net effect was a wrong impression of the situation and what has been achieved. Vietnam has made more striking progress in more ways than any other of the 17 Asian nations and colonies I revisited on my recent tour. Overall, the American aid program there has been a great success. These articles were an affront to an ally who has accomplished wonders but is still battling the Communists. They made propaganda for the enemy. And the Communists are also making propaganda use of the resultant congressional inquiries: Saying that they prove we regard our Asian allies as colonies, not as independent nations.

3. Congressional rehashes of bad situations that had already been cleaned up. Prime example: Laos. This inquiry directed attention to an obsolete past at the very time that a new, clean, courageous government was braving the gathering storm that has now broken.

4. Cuts in military aid. It is folly to reduce the military forces of the frontline free nations of Asia. Laos is a stark warning. We may have overarmed one ally—Pakistan—although I don't think so. The solution is a settlement between India and Pakistan, followed by a joint defense of the subcontinent, as advocated by President Ayub Khan of Pakistan.

5. The failure to put our development loans on a 5-year basis, so that Asian development programs can be more systematically planned.

6. Too much redtape. It slows and hampers our aid programs. Congress should try to reduce it.

These are the serious mistakes, a prescription for defeat. Of course, we should always be on guard against corruption and waste—although it's unreasonable to expect Western standards of all the new Asian governments. But we can't win the struggle for Asia—and the world—by beating the heads of our friends and the many competent, experienced, dedicated Americans who represent us overseas. Let us rid ourselves of this ugly cult, this masochistic defamation of American intelligence and character and of the Asian leaders and peoples who stand with us in the struggle for freedom.

PALO ALTO, CALIF., July 27, 1959.

Mr. ROY W. HOWARD,
President, Scripps-Howard Newspapers, New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. HOWARD: I should like to take serious issue with a matter of distorted and unfair reporting. I refer to Mr. Albert Colegrove's series of articles on U.S. aid in free Vietnam. In these articles, Mr. Colegrove is grossly unfair to the field personnel, and he fails completely to reach the heart of the problem of administering the foreign aid program.

Having worked overseas in aid programs for 8 years, I am convinced that foreign aid can be improved only by finding better leadership and understanding both in Washington and in the field. Better leadership means trained professional personnel of the highest caliber. Unfortunately, stories such as those written by Mr. Colegrove do great damage to those all too few able people who by reason of sincere dedication of purpose still belong to the International Cooperation Administration. They also seriously hamper efforts to attract new, highly qualified employees.

As to the specific program in Vietnam, there is no question that some of the projects mutually agreed upon between the Vietnamese and the United States may not have been those which you or I would choose as destined to make the greatest contribution to this joint effort in nation building. However, most of the ineffectiveness in this and other programs can be laid at the feet, not of the ICA mission director or his subordinates, but of the slow-moving, cumbersome machinery of government in Washington and the prevalence of a timid leadership which trembles at the query of a hostile Congressman or the critical pen of a Mr. Colegrove.

Should you wish to do a real public service as an able and public-spirited newspaper publisher and journalist, I would suggest that you strike at the heart of the problem of aid. This does not lie in any field mission; rather it lies squarely in Washington where the lack of positive policies and inspired leadership, such as that provided by Mr. Paul Hoffman during the Marshall plan days, has resulted in a steady exodus of able brains into private enterprise at the expense of well-planned and well-conceived policies and their execution.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD S. PRENTICE.

AMENDMENT OF TITLE 46, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO TYPES OF ARRESTMENT PROHIBITED WITH RESPECT TO WAGES OF CERTAIN SEAMEN—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] has a conference report to submit, and of course it is a privileged matter.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1958) to amend title 46, United States Code, section 601, to clarify types of arrestment prohibited with respect to wages of U.S. seamen. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of August 31, 1959, pp. 17401–17402, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

WATER POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, one of the bills pending on the Senate Calendar, having been already acted upon by the House of Representatives, and, having been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Public Works, due to the very able and efficient leadership of my distinguished colleague, the present Presiding Officer [Mr. McCARTHY], is the Blatnik-Humphrey water pollution control bill, to extend assistance for local communities to build sewage treatment plants.

This particular bill is of such vital importance that I am hopeful that it will be given priority consideration before the Congress adjourns.

I ask unanimous consent that a newsletter which I have prepared explaining this particular bill be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the newsletter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEAN WATER: THE NATION'S NEED

Without clean, fresh water, we simply could not live on this planet. Water-supply experts see a top limit of 600 billion gallons a day on the supply of water. Already we use 270 billion gallons a day, and the experts predict America will be using the full 600 billion gallons a day by 1980. By 1980 we won't be able to waste a single gallon of water. Yet pollution of our water supply by sewage and industrial use is a growing threat to this vital national resource. Thanks to the hard work of Senator EUGENE J. McCARTHY, the Senate Public Works Committee last week approved the Blatnik-Humphrey water pollution control bill to expand Federal assistance to local communities to build sewage treatment plants.

ACTION BY CONGRESS

Since the Federal water pollution control program began 3 years ago, construction of sewage treatment plants by local communities has increased from an average of $222 million to more than $380 million a year. But to catch up with the backlog of sewage treatment needs, to replace obsolete sewage plants and to keep up with the growing needs of our people and our industries, we must invest at least $575 million a year on sewage plants, according to the Public Health Service. Our legislation calls for $100 million a year in grants, with local communities paying 70 percent of the total costs of their projects. The House has approved the full figure, and the Senate Public Works Committee, last week supported a figure of $80 million a year. We are assured, then, of getting a substantial increase over the present $50 million annual program.

BENEFITS FOR MINNESOTA

During the past 3 years under the Blatnik-Humphrey Water Pollution Control Act, 29 Minnesota communities have received Federal grants to help build needed sewage treatment plants at an estimated total cost of $11,300,000. Three-fourths of these communities have less than 25,000 population. Without the 30 percent Federal contribution, many communities would not be able to go ahead on these urgent self-help water pollution control projects. Dr. R. N. Barr of the Minnesota Department of Health estimates that Minnesota sewage plant construction in the next 3 years will total about $21 million if there is sufficient Federal aid. Other new sewage plant construction and improvement needs in Minnesota would total another $110 million.

WATER POLLUTION CONTROL

The pollution control program is primarily a community self-help program. Federal grants can stimulate and encourage municipalities to take care of their sewage treatment needs, especially when they need just a little help to get over the hump. Under the new Blatnik-Humphrey proposal, we will also encourage many small communities to join together in building areawide sewage facilities by increasing the maximum project grant from $250,000 to $500,000. This program will promote good engineering practices and community responsibility. It will also protect our water resources—resources vital to our industry and farms, wildlife, and recreation and vital to the health of every American.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS AGREEMENTS AND DISARMAMENT EFFORTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in order that a subject which was discussed some time ago in the Senate may be given the final treatment it requires because of the seriousness of the situation, I invite the attention of Senators to an exchange of letters between the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Douglas Dillon and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and between Acting Secretary of State Douglas Dillon and the senior Senator from Minnesota. Mr. Dillon's letters were in reply to communications which Members of the Senate had sent to the President, relating to the transfer of information regarding nuclear weapons and nuclear weapons testing. A letter dated July 25, 1959, and signed by 13 Democratic Senators, was sent to the President, calling to his attention the agreement on nuclear sharing, and urging the President to state affirmatively and directly that these agreements and the sharing of nuclear weapons materials and data in no way prejudiced our position on disarmament, and in no way limited the willingness of our Government to engage in discussions relating to arms control arrangements in Europe, or agreement on the reunification of Germany.

I ask unanimous consent that the exchange of letters to which I have just alluded, including letters from the Acting Secretary of State as well as letters to the President of the United States, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 19, 1959.

Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: At the President's request the Department has given careful consideration to the letter addressed to the President by you and 13 other Members of the Senate on July 25 in which you suggested a declaration of policy concerning the agreements between the United States and certain other members of NATO on atomic cooperation for mutual defense.

As the President pointed out in transmitting the agreements to Congress, they are a partial implementation of the decisions taken at the NATO heads of government meeting of December 1957 in which the President participated. The decisions taken at that meeting were based upon political and defense objectives, which have remained the principal elements of NATO policy since that time. Among the political objectives which the heads of government of all NATO countries set forth at the conclusion of that meeting was disarmament, as follows:

"We continue firmly to stand for comprehensive and controlled disarmament, which we believe can be reached by stages. In spite of disappointments, we remain ready to discuss any reasonable proposal to reach this goal and to lay a solid foundation for durable peace. This is only way to dispel the anxieties arising from the armaments race."

In its statement of May 7 of this year refuting Soviet allegations concerning the modernization of NATO defenses, the North Atlantic Council, which is, as you know, the permanent civilian body which defines and controls the policy of the alliance, reaffirmed the bases of the policy as laid down by the heads of government in December 1957.

The members of NATO have had the consistent objective of maintaining the peace through the maintenance of defensive military strength. You may be assured that disarmament is and will continue to be a prime objectives of NATO. These agreements are not inconsistent with this objective. They are permissive in nature and in no way preclude their participants from entering into international arrangements either for the control and reduction of armaments or for the reunification of Germany, if such arrangements can be achieved.

I believe, therefore, that this clear record of common NATO policy and purpose with respect to these agreements makes unnecessary a special policy statement of the sort which you propose. It has been a source of satisfaction to NATO that the agreements have gone into effect, and I am appreciative of the opportunity to explain the position of this Government with respect to these agreements and the vital problem of disarmament.

Sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS DILLON,
Acting Secretary.

JULY 30, 1959.

Hon. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write regarding the agreements between the United States and seven NATO countries on the transfer by the United States of certain information and material relating to nuclear weapons.

I have concurred with my colleagues in allowing these agreements to become effective, as I agree with you that they are needed in the security interest of the NATO alliance and therefore of the United States. It is a fact, though, that many citizens from my constituency have written me and called upon me urging that the result of these agreements may be to embarrass our efforts to attain agreements for the control and inspection of nuclear weapons testing and protection against surprise attack, and for the resolution of the problems of a divided Berlin and Germany. While the agreements are becoming effective, unanswered questions and developments of which these agreements may be a starting point appear to continue to trouble many Americans. I respectfully submit therefore that it would be helpful to the support for the President's foreign policy, in connection with the effectiveness of these agreements, for the President at a suitable opportunity to make a declaration on the subject. This declaration could be that the agreements in no way preclude the United States and the other parties to the agreements from entering into treaties in the future with the Soviet Union and other nations concerning the control and reduction of armaments, that they in no way prejudice the negotiations for the reunification of Germany, and that they in no way bind the United States to continue to supply the recipient governments with nuclear information and materials if this action should be prohibited by international compacts.

Such a declaration by the President would, I feel, be helpful to the President's peace leadership and evidence again the willingness of the United States at any time to consider suitable proposals for the solution of outstanding differences such as the reunification of Germany and the reduction and control of nuclear weapons and other armaments.

Respectfully,

JACOB K. JAVITS.

JULY 25, 1959.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We write to you regarding the proposed agreements between the United States and seven NATO countries on the transfer of U.S. nuclear weapons information and equipment.

As you are aware, the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, specifies that agreements on nuclear sharing go into effect unless Congress, within 60 days after the agreements have been submitted to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, acts by concurrent resolution to reject the agreements.

Although we have misgivings with respect to the United States entering into these agreements at this particular time, we have concluded that the problems involved in these agreements cannot be solved by the Senate and House passing a resolution of rejection.

A number of people in this country and abroad, nevertheless, question the necessity and wisdom of these agreements on sharing nuclear weapons materials and data. In view of this concern here and abroad, we respectfully suggest, Mr. President, that serious consideration be given to the issuance of a declaration of policy by you on behalf of the United States. We have in mind a declaration which would clearly show that the dictates of military policy do not take precedence over U.S. political and diplomatic policies. It could reassure our people that the agreements in no way preclude the United States from entering into agreements in the future with the Soviet Union and other nations concerning the control and reduction of armaments, that they in no way prejudice the reunification of Germany, and that they in no way bind the United States to continue to supply the recipient governments with nuclear information and materials if this action should be prohibited by international agreements dealing with arms control arrangements in Europe or agreement on the reunification of Germany.

Such a declaration by you or by all the governments to be parties to the agreements would demonstrate that military decisions are subordinate to larger political and diplomatic objectives. It would also indicate the peaceful intentions of the United States and our willingness at any time to consider proposals for the solution of outstanding political differences such as the reunification of Germany and for the reduction and control of nuclear weapons and other armaments.

Respectfully,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, JOHN A. CARROLL, FRANK CHURCH, EUGENE MCCARTHY, WAYNE MORSE, PHILIP A. HART, DICK NEUBERGER, JOSEPH S. CLARK, JOHN KENNEDY, WILLIAM PROXMIRE, STEPHEN YOUNG, HARRISON WILLIAMS, EDMUND S. MUSKIE, MIKE MANSFIELD.

ANALYSIS OF CIVIL DEFENSE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to an item which appeared in the Washington Post of this morning, a headlined story which I believe does not accurately reflect the position which was stated in the Senate by the senior Senator from Minnesota.

I hold in my hand an Associated Press dispatch from the Washington Post of this morning, entitled "Voluntary Shelters Plan Opposed by HUMPHREY."

The opening paragraphs read:

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, yesterday opposed a New York plan for voluntary construction of atomic bomb fallout shelters.

He urged instead a Federal program of direct or matching assistance to States and communities to build realistic protection against radioactive fallout.

HUMPHREY said in a Senate speech he was opposed to either a voluntary or mandatory plan of shelter construction which does not include Federal grants.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire story as reported be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOLUNTARY SHELTERS PLAN OPPOSED BY HUMPHREY

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, yesterday opposed a New York plan for voluntary construction of atomic bomb fallout shelters.

He urged instead a Federal program of direct or matching assistance to States and communities to build realistic protection against radioactive fallout.

Humphrey said in a Senate speech he was opposed to either a voluntary or mandatory plan of shelter construction which does not include Federal grants.

"Certainly the average American can hardly be expected to take a voluntary shelter program seriously when the Federal Government does not itself require that its own public buildings * * * be equipped with shelters," he said.

HUMPHREY said the full resources of the Government from the White House down must be marshaled to provide fallout protection.

The Governors' conference early this month urged immediate action on a nationwide fallout shelter program based on a plan organized in New York.

A group of advisers to Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller had suggested mandatory construction of shelters by citizens and stockpiling of emergency supplies to enable families to exist during and after a nuclear attack.

HUMPHREY did not say how much money would be needed to provide Federal grants for shelter construction but stated that $50 million would be nothing more than a gesture.

He said military leaders have given tacit recognition to the value of shelter programs by building underground command centers. He added:

"But what about the people our military leaders are trying to defend?

"It would be a hollow victory indeed if the leaders should survive and the people perish—simply because of a reluctance to develop a prudent and simple fallout shelter program."

HUMPHREY estimated that 25 million lives could be saved in the medium-sized nuclear attack if adequate fallout shelters are provided.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I call the attention of Senators to exactly what I did say in my speech yesterday. I shall read only a few paragraphs. First, I said:

It is important to distinguish between a "fallout shelter" program and the enormously more expensive program to provide not only protection against radioactive fallout, but also against heat and blast. While even the fallout shelter program would require major investment, the return from such an investment would be fantastically large—perhaps 25 million American lives saved in the case of a medium-sized nuclear attack—that it must be given the most serious consideration.

I said further:

I maintain, therefore, Mr. President, that if the United States is to survive a potential nuclear attack, it is imperative that the Federal Government develop an aggressive, commonsense approach to radiation protection, either through direct Federal financing or matching financing with the States, which would provide maximum protection for the population, assure that the national economy would continue to function, and enable the Nation to swiftly recover from initial attack.

This is the paragraph which is controlling.

The Federal Government will abdicate its responsibilities if it is content with only a voluntary, do-it-yourself shelter building program. As appealing as a voluntary home shelter program is, and of course the more Americans who become interested in building home shelters the better, we are never going to have a realistic program of civilian survival in the case of nuclear attack without vigorous and aggressive governmental leadership from the White House on down.

While there is a great deal the average American householder in the fallout zone can do to protect his family, even if he begins during the first 30 minutes after a nuclear explosion, it is sheer folly to delay the bringing to bear of all the resources of the community, State and Federal levels of government in a comprehensive fallout shelter program, sparked and maintained by Federal example and Federal leadership.

What I said was that we need both a voluntary program and Federal cooperation. The senior Senator from Minnesota did not say that we should abandon voluntary efforts. What I said was that we cannot expect voluntary efforts alone to do the job that needs to be done if we are to have a truly effective fallout shelter program.

I called upon the Federal Government, in cooperation with State and local governments, to work in cooperation with citizen groups and with voluntary action to get this job done. I urged on the Federal Government either grants or matching funds with States for the purpose of encouraging a broadly conceived and fullfilled fallout shelter program. I think this program is essential to our national security program, and should be undertaken forthwith.

WATER POLLUTION

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the Nation faces a continuing problem of water pollution. We must meet this problem with an adequate and effective water pollution control program. In the Milwaukee Journal of August 23, 1959, R. G. Lynch clearly shows that our present water pollution control efforts are inadequate to keep our water supplies pure.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOULING OF U.S. WATER OUTRUNS PURIFICATION—POLLUTION PROBLEM GROWS IN MANY STATES DESPITE CONTROL EFFORTS, SEWAGE PLANTS BUILT WITH FEDERAL AID; BIGGER PROGRAM SOUGHT

(By R. G. Lynch)

Milwaukee beaches are empty these hot days, bathing forbidden. Swans and ducks died on the Estabrook Park lagoon last week and more wild ducks, dead and dying, were found on the Milwaukee River. From any downtown bridge this summer dead fish could be seen—or smelled—floating and bloating in the river.

Milwaukee is being forced to look at evidence of one of the Nation's most pressing problems, contamination of water supplies. Pollution no longer describes what is happening, with enormous quantities of detergents, pesticides, and industrial chemicals and metals being added to the sewage—and garbage sometimes—of a rapidly increasing population.

FEDERAL AID SPURS 1,400 SEWAGE PLANTS

Streams, lakes, and coastal waters are receiving torrents of contaminating stuff. The Federal Government, at the request of various States, is pressing for control of pollution in half a dozen rivers. Last April Federal authorities ordered Sioux City, Iowa, to stop sending sewage down the Missouri River to Omaha, Nebr. In 1957 Arkansas was ordered to prevent oil field pollution from going down Corney Creek into Louisiana.

Federal aid, voted by the 1956 Congress, has stimulated construction, starts or authorization of more than 1,400 sewage treatment plants.

Great strides have been made under an eight State compact to clean up the Ohio River Basin and seven States are making progress under a New England compact.

A National Technical Task Committee on Industrial Wastes has been working for 7 years and various industries have their own projects.

Yet, the Nation is not keeping pace with the increase in the load of contamination that goes into its waters.

TAFT CENTER RESEARCH

Industries which pour their wastes into municipal sewers are complicating problems of sewage treatment plants. The Federal Government is carrying on investigations at the Robert A. Taft sanitary engineering center, Cincinnati, Ohio, and in the field at places of extraordinary pollution problems. The center also conducts training programs for sanitary engineers and scientists.

Contamination of the seas led the United Nations to query 42 nations and publish a report in 1956. The most serious international problem is the dumping of oil in the seas. The United States has had such messes on all of its coasts and the Great Lakes. Canada has talked of 50-mile off coast ban as a result of oil contamination of Vancouver Bay.

More than 150 areas along the Michigan shore are having serious trouble this summer with oil that continues to escape from a barge which sank last winter in Lake Michigan.

If it is any consolation to Milwaukeeans, conditions are as bad in many other places as they are here, far worse in some. Madison closed a beach on Lake Monona this summer and swimming was banned in the Embarrass River above Clintonville.

BEACHES HAVE CLOSED IN MOST COAST STATES

Beaches have been closed to bathers in recent years in almost every State along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Gulf of Mexico. Santa Monica Beach in southern California was quarantined as long ago as 1943. A New York newspaper recently commented that all but 36 miles of the city's 400-mile waterfront had become unfit for bathing. Boston has had to close beaches.

While hazard to human health commands greatest attenton, contamination of waters also is a serious threat to fisheries. About 500,000 people depend on commercial fishing for a living, and fish are an important source of both protein food and industrial products. Already both food and sport fisheries have been destroyed.

The lower Fox River in Wisconsin is practically a sewer for paper mills, in parts barren of aquatic life, and fish are not palatable from parts of other papermill rivers in the State. The pulp industry, incidentally, has reduced the pollution load per ton of product by half over the last decade at a cost of $85 million but still is one of the worst offenders.

The south shore of Lake Erie no longer supports aquatic life because rivers have coated the bottom with filth for miles out.

THE DIRTY MISSOURI

Fishing has been wiped out in the Mississippi River for miles below St. Louis, Mo., because of sewage, garbage, and industrial wastes from the metropolitan area. The Missouri River is not much better below Kansas City. The Missouri, incidentally, receives raw or inadequately treated sewage and waste from 700 communities and 250 industries, besides the effluent of those with adequate treatment plants.

Atlantic salmon runs in Maine waters have been reduced almost to nothing by pulpmills and power dams. Gross pollution from the Philadelphia-Camden industrial complex has practically eliminated shad runs in the Delaware River and estuary. The Virginia water control board only this year fined a mill $155,000 for waste kill of about half a million fish for 35 miles downstream.

Dave Wallace, director of the Oyster Institute of America, told a congressional committee in 1956 that at least 100,000 acres of oyster and clam beds no longer were fished because of pollution, and estimated the annual loss to the industry at $15 million.

SEAFOOD GATHERS RADIOACTIVE FALLOUT

Oysters and clams concentrate polluting materials. This is a characteristic which all aquatic life manifests to a degree that is causing anxiety about radioactive fallout.

Plant and animal forms of plankton, at the beginning of the aquatic food chain, assimilate radioactive material, and other organisms all the way up to food fish accumulate more or less long-lived radioactive stuff in various parts of their bodies. And fish the world over are a more important human food supply than land animals.

Wisconsin's slow progress against the contamination problem looks good by comparison with what is happening in less progressive States.

This State has had a good pollution law since 1927, a full-time director and staff since 1950. In 1930, treatment removed 531,000 pounds of polluting material from State waters; by 1954, additional treatment plants had raised the total to 1,410,000 pounds. But in the same period, the potential load increased from 1,540,000 pounds to 2,351,000. So all there was to show for a quarter century of effort was a net reduction of 7 percent.

A Missouri survey in 1949 showed that some 900 miles of streams were polluted in 69 counties. This year another survey showed 1,200 miles of polluted streams in 74 counties and the St. Louis metropolitan area.

The story in most States has been "too little and too late." The national picture was sketched thus by a U.S. Public Health Service official:

In 1920, municipal and organic industrial wastes discharged into the Nation's streams were equivalent to the untreated sewage from 90 million people. Despite construction of $7 billion worth of municipal treatment plants and a good deal of progress by industry in treating wastes, the load in 1955 was equal to the untreated sewage from 165 million people. Municipal pollution was up 37½ percent; industrial contamination, up 120 percent.

Dr. L. E. Burney, Surgeon General of the Service, thinks that natural streams in many cases just will not be able to absorb increased pollution.

"As population and industries continue to close the gaps between major sources of pollution along our rivers," he has said, "we can look forward to nothing less than continuous streams of sewage and industrial waste, instead of streams of usable water."

ONE CITY'S SEWAGE IS ANOTHER'S DRINK

Reuse of water looms ever larger in the Nation's future. The natural supply cannot be materially increased, either by cloud seeding or conversion of saline water. Already there is a great deal of reuse along rivers. Even if it is only industrial use, water quality is important, and where a river supplies municipal needs, the sewage of one city becomes the drinking water of the next.

Ohio River water is used over and over by 116 communities and 80 major industries. Twelve communities depend on the Neosho River in Kansas and at times in a recent drought year the whole flow available to each waterworks was no more than the sewage discharged by the city above. Treatment made it relatively fit to drink—if bottled water or something else was not obtainable.

U.S. AID FOR PLANTS

Wartime material shortages practically stopped construction of treatment plants. Postwar population increase did the rest. Not only was sewage polluting streams; it stood and stank in ditches where suburban septic tanks or soil conditions could not handle it.

Congress passed a bipartisan water pollution control act in 1948 after more than 100 bills had been introduced. It called for Federal cooperation with States in research and technical aid and gave limited authority to the Public Health Service over interstate waters.

The President recommended stronger legislation in 1954 and 2 years of study and discussion led to a new law in 1956, offering grants-in-aid to localities up to a total of $50 million a year. A grant cannot be more than $250,000 or 30 percent of the project cost, whichever is smaller.

About that time the Health Service estimated that 8,000 sewage plants and 9,000 other plants, chiefly for industry wastes, were needed to clean up the Nation's waters, and put the cost at $9 to $12 billion. Strong efforts are being made in the present Congress to increase the program to $100 million a year and raise the maximum for any single project.

NEW YORK SHIPS SLUDGE TO SEA

Pending also is a House bill to increase Federal police powers. The 1956 law empowered the Welfare Secretary (boss of PHS) to take action at the request of any State where interstate waters were being contaminated by another State. This was the basis of the Corney Creek and Sioux City orders. The new bill would extend Federal authority to all navigable streams and authorize the Secretary to act at the request of any municipal government. This would give Illinois River cities a weapon against Chicago's flushing of sewage downstream.

The proportions of the contamination problem cannot be described merely in terms of untreated sewage and wastes. So enormous is the volume to be disposed of that even the products of treatment plants pose serious problems.

Treatment of sewage converts solids into sludge, liquids into effluent. Drying eliminates the odor of sludge and in this form it makes good fertilizer, such as the Milwaukee sewage plant produces. Few cities do this.

New York barges its sludge out to sea. This is better than dumping in offshore waters, but the long-range result is a matter of speculation, particularly if many cities resort to this method.

The Public Health Service has refused to approve grants for plants which would discharge sludge into waters. Surgeon General Burney has insisted on substantially complete removal of settleable solids before sewage effluents are discharged into waters.

Boston, Mass., and Asbury Park, N.J., were the latest applicants turned away.

DETERGENT PROBLEM

The effluent of sewage plants creates problems where current does not disperse it. Available nitrogen is present in such quantities that algae and bottom plants are stimulated. Wisconsin has this problem to a degree. In the South, where the growing season is longer, shallow lakes may become peat bogs in time.

Detergents pass through treatment plants practically intact and interfere with processing. There is anxiety about the eventual accumulation of such "stuff" which is being used at the rate of 2½ billion pounds a year in this country.

Mark D. Hollis, the Nation's Chief Sanitary Engineer, has described streams as "giant test tubes."

"Chemicals react on one another," he explained. "Two parts per million of copper will not hurt fish, nor eight parts of zinc; but if you combine as little as one-tenth of those amounts of copper and zinc you kill all of the fish in the stream."

This reporter recently discussed the awesome proportions of sewage and waste disposal with Dr. Clarence Tarzwell, chief of aquatic biology for the Public Health Service.

"What we call complete treatment of sewage," said Dr. Tarzwell, "is not going to be enough. When we remove 95 percent of 1,000 pounds of polluting material, only 50 pounds remain, but when it is 95 percent of 1 million pounds, 50,000 pounds remain.

"We have got to convert waste organic materials into useful products. We must harvest a crop of nutrients—fertilizer, protein food."

OUR POLLUTED WATERS

The subject of water pollution has been in the news almost constantly of late. It is an unpleasant matter to consider; one that many would prefer to ignore.

The results of past failures to learn more about the problem, and to insist on doing something about it, now confront us with a disgusting and truly alarming situation. It has reached proportions far beyond anything most of us yet realize.

So you are urged to read the article in this section of the Journal today by R. G. Lynch about the fouling of U.S. water.

It is hard to believe that clean Americans have allowed such filthy practices in waste disposal to continue and expand. It is astounding that there has been so little public demand for correction of these conditions.

Quite a bit has been accomplished in Wisconsin through use of the State's police power—cracking down on municipalities and industries not doing what they could to reduce pollution. The proposed use of Federal police power to check interstate spread of pollution would certainly be in order.

There is room for argument as to the soundest, fairest, and most effective methods for cleaning up America's water supply. The need for redoubling efforts is beyond argument.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR McCLELLAN AT PEPPERDINE COLLEGE FREEDOM FORUM

During the delivery of Mr. PROXMIRE's speech,

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from Georgia for an insertion in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. I appreciate the courtesy of the junior Senator from Wisconsin in yielding to me.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the insertion I am about to make in the RECORD appear before the remarks of the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. On June 23 of this year the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] delivered an address at the Pepperdine College's Freedom Forum, in Los Angeles, Calif.

As always, the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas presented his views in a forthright manner. I feel that Members of Congress, as well as other readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, would be interested in what our distinguished colleague had to say. I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from his remarks at that time be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOHN L. McCLELLAN, PEPPERDINE COLLEGE'S FREEDOM FORUM, BILTMORE HOTEL, LOS ANGELES, CALIF., JUNE 23, 1959

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, I am highly pleased and happy to be your guest today. It is an esteemed privilege and honor indeed to address this magnificent audience of representative citizens of this great west coast section of our Nation. Needless to say I have looked forward to this delightful occasion with keenest anticipation and pleasure.

I congratulate and heartily commend Dr. Benson, Pepperdine College, and others who have sponsored or aided in the promotion of freedom forums that are designed to inculcate in our people a higher sense of patriotic duty and a deeper consciousness of their individual citizenship responsibilities.

Stimulating public discussions by eminent authorities of important current topics and issues, such as those included in these forum programs, contribute immeasurably to a better informed citizenry and to a sounder and more vigorous public opinion. I only wish that the people in every community in America might have the opportunity to attend one of these meetings and to enjoy and profit by the valuable instruction and information that these forums provide.

For the subject of my remarks today, you have asked me to answer a question—one of the gravest and most vital—"Can American Freedom Survive?" Obviously the question is quite simple, but the answer is not, and if you expect me to give you the full answer within the next 20 minutes or so, I tell you now it can't be done.

The positive, affirmative answer that we would all hope for and would like to hear cannot be given unequivocally and without reservations. A "Yes" answer is fraught with many contingencies and is subject to a multitude of qualifications. The mere inquiry itself seems prompted by a measure of fear that connotes understandable doubts and apprehensions.

Perhaps in all truth I should be asking you this question—not trying to answer it for you—for I am persuaded the real answer is not to be found in Washington, D.C., or in any other place of government. I believe it lies in every city, town, hamlet, village, and crossroads community; in every farm and factory, in every business, labor union, and in all other organized human activity.

Ultimately the final answer is reposed in the hearts and minds, and in the consecrated will and dedicated purpose, of our people. We shall have freedom if we really want it—if we are ready and willing to pay the price for its survival. If, however, we take freedom for granted, become complacent, relax our vigilance, and give to it only lip service while we devote ourselves to the pursuit of objectives which are inconsistent with freedom, then we shall surely lose it.

At no time in our generation has our country faced more intricate and perplexing problems or graver dangers than those that now confront us, and that will likely confront us in the immediate years ahead. Some of them are of a nature and magnitude that seriously threaten national security and the survival of many of our social, political, and economic freedoms.

They present a compelling challenge. We cannot be insensitive or indifferent to their inevitable consequences should they be left unresolved. And the issues they involve can only be resolved by the exercises of a high order of statesmanship that rises above the common level of partisan politics. On how effectively and successfully we face up to our responsibilities within the next few years and meet that challenge may well depend the destiny of our Nation and the fate of the entire free world.

The propriety of time for my remarks will not permit me to cover the full range of all dangers that threaten our survival and the impairment or destruction of our freedom; but I should like to make some passing reference to three of them and then discuss a fourth.

The first of the three is instability in international affairs. With the cold war continuing, with what may be mounting intensity while hope for the success of the (presently recessed) Geneva conference diminishes, the issue of war or peace still remains paramount and supreme. Tragically, in our pursuit of peace we are forced to cope with governments of low order and bankrupt integrity, which by doctrine and practice disdain and repudiate as mere scraps of paper their solemn international and treaty obligations.

Thus, the chief obstacle athwart the path to peace and understanding is the manifest disregard of the Communists for their own pledges and solemn commitments. Their demonstrated lack of good faith and their willful refusal to settle international differences, are wholly responsible for having divided the world into two armed camps, and for the ever-present explosive tensions that could and that some day may erupt into a universal catastrophe. In this unhappy situation we have no alternative—no choice—but to build and maintain a powerful arsenal of military strength of convincing deterrent proportions. Failure to do so would expose us to military defeat and Communist conquest, and that is unthinkable.

The second of the three is instability in our fiscal affairs. Habitual deficit spending, pyramiding the national debt, and the tolerating of a permanently unbalanced budget, are potent factors that are moving us swiftly toward disastrous inflation. I agree with the President of the United States; the budget should be balanced. That, we know, will not be easy to do. It will be a mountainous task but it is the duty of Congress to stop deficit spending just as quickly as it is possible to do so without jeopardizing our national defense and security. Those who ridicule the idea, who scoff at a balanced budget, and who vote accordingly, may well be inviting economic chaos and national insolvency, which could well do irreparable harm and injury to the quality and standard of economic and political freedom that is our cherished heritage.

The third and next danger to which I draw your attention is one that could easily undermine the very foundations of our Republic. It is the instability and lack of constitutional and judicial soundness of some of our Supreme Court decisions within the past few years. In these decisions the Court has, among other things, usurped legislative powers vested in the Congress; encroached upon State sovereignty; tended to favor the Communist and criminal elements of this country; ignored and practically nullified the 10th amendment to the Constitution by giving no probative force to its provisions that reserve to the States respectively, or to the people thereof, all powers not delegated by the Constitution to the Federal Government; glibly overruled and set aside decisions made and precedents established at a time when the Court was composed of Justices learned in the law and schooled in the rudiments of American jurisprudence.

These decisions of the Court have provoked strong criticism from unimpeachable sources because those sources recognize, as we do, the consequences of such decisions are frightening to contemplate. Unless these trends can be checked and reversed, the usurpation of legislative powers stopped, State sovereignty will be destroyed and an all-powerful centralized Federal Government will be enthroned in Washington.

I am unwilling to stand silently by, acquiesce in, and see the sovereign States of our Republic reduced to a provincial status. Make no mistake about it, when State sovereignty is destroyed or rendered impotent, the range of our freedoms will be substantially narrowed and their vigor materially suppressed.

The fourth great peril to our security and welfare is the instability or, more accurately stated, the lack of integrity in many areas of labor-management relations.

The sordid disclosures made and improper practices revealed by the Senate select committee in the course of 2½ years of investigations are appalling and shocking to the extreme. We have exposed many, many evils that are outrageously cruel, corrupt, contemptible, and criminal. It has been clearly established that the infiltration of gangsters, racketeers, and underworld characters into some labor unions and businesses is primarily responsible for the rotten, nauseating situations that now prevail.

The task of this select committee has been enormous. We have had to deal with people of no character, with manipulators, conspirators, crooks, thieves, mobsters, extortionists, and murderers. In trying to get the facts, we have repeatedly encountered exasperating hindrances and efforts at obstruction. On the witness stand we have been confronted with forgetfulness experts, bald-faced prejurers, and 5th amendment artists. Out of more than 1,300 witnesses heard during 250 days of public hearings, some 225 or 230 fifth amendment slackers have paraded before us in sickening and disgusting succession invoking the privilege against self-incrimination.

These unwholesome conditions the committee has exposed must be corrected. They cannot be condoned by a decent society nor tolerated or permitted to exist by a government of law and order. Understand we do not condemn the labor movement as a whole. There is yet much good in organized labor and in the great majority of unions, but the unfortunate fact is that some segments of the labor movement are no longer marked by the highest ethics or a uniform standard of moral soundness.

On the contrary, the classical concept of ideals in unionism have, in too many instances, been willfully exploited and perverted to private ends. In short, and tragically, too many unions have fallen into the hand of parasitically brutal, cynical men, to whom unionism means only a royal road to personal riches and power; men of beastly instinct who regard union members not as human beings but as mere chattels to be subjugated and manipulated to serve the malicious greed and avarice of their labor boss masters, or to be destroyed if they dare to protest or resist.

To such men, union charters (which are sometimes bought and traded as a rare and prized commodity of great value) have become a form of hunting license, letters of mark and reprisal, to prey upon and exploit working men and women in commerce and industry. Those who are perpetrators of this criminal exploitation have become brazenly arrogant and defiant. Some of them are threatening to go so far as to challenge the very supremacy of the Government.

We now know that labor cannot clean its own house. The AFL–CIO's code of ethics is ineffective. It has not stopped corruption or improper activities. The truth is that code is flouted at will and with reckless abandon and contemptuous disregard by the Hoffas, the Brennans, the Cohns, the Becks, the Dioguardias, and others who neither respect nor observe it. Effective legislative remedies will have to be applied. That is now the only course we can pursue.

The Senate select committee has done its job of developing the facts and presenting to the Congress the information it needs to legislate in this field. The burden and responsibility for enacting adequate laws now rests squarely and heavily upon the Congress. Failure of Congress to act will expose our Government and our economy to domination by gangster-type racketeers and the hoodlum elements that have infiltrated labor-management relations.

The Senate select committee has sampled the results of some instances where city and county governments have come under the influence of exploiters and terrorists. We know what it is like. Freedom ends. The man who dares to object or interfere is frequently marked for extinction. The internal government of unions dominated by these criminal elements is a ghastly burlesque on democracy. A rank and file member of such a union has no freedom. He is a helpless serf. His type of employment becomes a vested interest of the union. His job—his very means of livelihood—is treated as a property of the union. He is made dependent, and acceptance of his unhappy lot is enforced upon him by economic coercion and physical brutality.

It may well be impossible for you or anyone else who has not sat through the long hours of hearings as I have to grasp even dimly the fullness and extent of oppression imposed on some union members and the suppression of their natural rights as men and their political rights as citizens.

We think that couldn't happen in America, but it has happened; and I tell you now if that pattern of democracy and justice should ever become our way of life, if such disreputable elements to which I have made reference should ever come to influence, make and administer our laws and control our economy, then the answer to the question before us, "Can American freedom survive?" would have to be a resounding "No." Freedom would be dead.

I regret to note that there is increasing doubt and growing concern about what Congress will do. I had confidently hoped that Congress would measure up and face up to the issue and do its duty, but I must confess I am beginning to wonder if it will.

The Kennedy-Ervin bill with the many strengthening amendments adopted by the Senate will do some good if it is enacted into law. It will not be a total loss, but it will not by any means do the whole job that is needed.

It is greatly deficient in that it fails to provide a solution for the "no man's land" problem, and thus leaves, throughout the country, many small businesses and their employees wronged and without a remedy. The NLRB still refuses to accept jurisdiction of their complaints, and they are still denied the right of court action for redress of their grievances. This situation is unjustified. It is totally un-American and should be corrected, but the Senate refused to do anything about it.

Again, the bill is wholly inadequate to deal with the abuses of secondary boycotts and the vicious practice of blackmail picketing and coercive top-down organization induced by recognitional picketing. These are devices frequently used for the shakedown of management by labor-racket extortionists and to compel employees to join a union against their will, or to force their employer to recognize as their bargaining agent and without their consent a union of which they are not members and to which they do not want to belong. Such tactics cannot be reconciled without traditional American concept of freedom and the dignity of man, and they should be outlawed.

The House of Representatives, now considering this legislation, has not only the opportunity but also, I believe, the solemn duty to correct these deficiencies by appropriate provisions in any bill that it may pass.

The House of Representatives also has the duty to hold the line and preserve the gains made by amendments adopted in the Senate to the Kennedy-Ervin bill—the most essential and important of which is title I, the bill of rights for union members.

This bill of rights amendment, which I sponsored, has become the most controversial provision in this legislation. It is now being subjected to vicious and malicious false criticism and distorted interpretation. These unjustifiable assaults are being made by those who are opposed to rank and file union members having the rights, freedoms, and protection that the amendment seeks to guarantee.

And what are these rights and freedoms? Simply stated, in part they are:

(a) The right of free speech and assembly;

(b) The right to attend union meetings, to discuss union business, take part in deliberations, to vote on all issues, to nominate candidates, run for office, and to vote in all elections;

(c) The right to be protected from arbitrary and unwarranted disciplinary action, to be served with written specific charges, given reasonable time to prepare a defense, and be afforded a full and fair hearing before any punishment or penalty is imposed; and

(d) The right to sue the union or any person who violates or infringes upon these rights guaranteed to union members.

A criminal penalty of a fine up to $10,000 and up to 2 years in jail is provided for those who by violence, force, threats, economic coercion, or reprisal deny to, restrain, or prevent any member from exercising any right to which he is entitled under this bill of rights.

The effect of such a law would simply be to carry into the union halls of organized labor throughout this country and make applicable to union members the basic human rights and protections that are vouchsafed to all of us by the Bill of Rights to the Constitution of the United States.

What is wrong with that? I tell you there is nothing wrong with it. It compels the arrogant union bosses and dictators to respect the dignity of man; it curbs the arbitrary and excessive powers that many of them have been exercising to suppress and oppress dues-paying members; it restores to union members the democratic processes that they have been denied; and, it gives to them the tools with which they can help to drive the thieves, racketeers, and criminal elements out of their union. It will emancipate many workers who are now enslaved. It should be made the law and a basic fundamental of our national labor policy.

The challenging issue now is: Will the Congress enact effective laws to deal with corruption and racketeering in labor organizations and to prevent the exploitation of union members by dishonest, arrogant, dictatorial, and sometimes criminal, labor bosses; and restore to union members the right, authority, and power to manage and control their union affairs by recognized and respected democratic processes? Will the Congress do its duty and meet this vital responsibility?

Needless to say, every racketeering, criminal, and hoodlum labor official in the country is hoping the Congress will shirk its duty and either pass no bill at all or pass one that is so weak that it will be ineffectual. Those elements, of course, are now doing everything in their power to obstruct and prevent the enactment of laws adequate to do the job that is needed.

On the other hand, millions of rank and file union members and good citizens everywhere, and in all walks of life, are hoping and praying that the Congress will have the intestinal fortitude and political courage to do its duty and pass laws to outlaw and prevent the corruption, abuses, and exploitation that the Senate select committee has exposed—laws that will help restore decency and integrity in labor-management relations.

We don't—we can't—fool anybody about freedom. Not what we say but what we do will determine the course of events. If freedom is what we really want, we shall have it. Our forefathers in words, deeds, and sacrifices pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to secure it. We should be willing to pay that price, too, for its growth and survival. American freedom can survive if we really want it to. The answer lies within us.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the committee amendment.

The Chair recognizes the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, yesterday the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] discussed the implications of the vote taken in the Senate on H.R. 1 yesterday.

The Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] asked how was it that the Senate voted against tabling the motion to send H.R. 1 to the Foreign Relations Committee, and then later voted against sending it there, and I said that the only solution which makes sense to me is that some Senators at least wanted to hear more debate. Upon reflection I believe it is clear that that is the only explanation which makes sense, and the Senator from Alabama confirmed that by specifying the debate and the explanations he desired to hear when he said this, and I quote from page 17394 of the RECORD:

The question then comes to my mind, Why did we not receive the additional debate? I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, I think his analysis is exactly correct. That was my own thinking. If the motion were voted down, then I thought we would have a debate on the question relating to the interest which Canada had in the matter, but instead of debate, immediately there came a vote on the motion to refer the bill to the committee, so we did not hear the debate.

I will say as one Senator, to me all of this is very confusing. There are many things concerning this matter I do not understand. I have not understood them yet. I will say, so far as I am concerned, the principal point is the interest which Canada has in this matter and the effect our action might have upon a friendly government.

Then later the Senator from Alabama said:

Why does not the International Joint Commission have jurisdiction over this subject? Does it have any jurisdiction over it?

There was a discussion at that point about the International Joint Commission and its jurisdiction. Unfortunately, I did not have at my fingertips at that time the position of Canada on the jurisdiction of the International Joint Commission. I have it now, and I should like to read that at this point for the information of the Senate, because I think it bears very, very directly on the kind of answers the Senator from Alabama and others felt were necessary before the Senate decided whether to send the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee or not. This is a note from the Canadian Ambassador to the Acting Secretary of State. It is dated April 9, 1959.

Incidentally, there have been some people who say, "If Canada objects, why do they not make a formal protest?" I do not know how the Canadian Government could be any more formal than for the Ambassador of their country to send a note to the Secretary of State of this Government.

The note says:

The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States of America and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago and directs attention to provisions of two treaties, in particular.

(a) The Boundary Waters Treaty, 1909—

Then the Canadian Ambassador says:

The applicability of either article II, paragraph 2 or article III of this treaty depends upon the interpretation of physical facts.

If Lake Michigan physically flows into the boundary water Lake Huron, article II preserves to Canada the right to object to such a diversion which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests in Canadian waters.

Here is the direct answer to the question raised by the Senator from Alabama:

If, as has been asserted by eminent U.S.A. jurists, article III of the treaty applies, no further diversion shall be made except with the approval of the International Joint Commission.

In other words, the position of Canada is that the International Joint Commission has jurisdiction, and it noted that no further diversion should be permitted under any circumstances except with the approval of the International Joint Commission. The note from the Ambassador of Canada then proceeds:

(b) Niagara Treaty, 1950: This treaty allocates water for scenic and power purposes. The amount of water which shall be available for these purposes is the total outflow from Lake Erie. The specific inclusion of certain added waters in article III of the treaty emphasizes the underlying assumption that existing supplies will continue unabated.

I now skip some of the material, because I do not want to delay, but a little later the note from Canada says the following:

The order of approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, as supplemented on July 2, 1956, and accepted by both our governments, forms the basis for the construction and operation of the hydroelectric power installations in the international section of the St. Lawrence River. Criterion (a) of this order of approval assumes a continuous diversion out of the Great Lakes Basin limited to the present 3,100 cubic feet per second at Chicago.

The figure 3,100 assumes a total of 1,500 cubic feet plus domestic pumpage, which would make a total of about 3,100 cubic feet.

I submit that this is a direct answer to the question of the Senator from Alabama, who said, as appears on pages 17394–17395 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 31, 1959:

I wonder why Canada, if she feels aggrieved, does not refer the case to the International Joint Commission. In fact, it would seem to me, from reading this provision that the International Joint Commission, if the situation is a problem involving both Canada and the United States, would automatically have jurisdiction over it and could assume jurisdiction, or could intervene in any one of the attempts to divert water.

This is exactly the position of the Canadian Government. It could not be more explicitly or clearly stated. Canada emphatically objects to our diverting this water. She asserts that the International Joint Commission, under any circumstances, has jurisdiction. I think the case is as clear as a case could possibly be.

Later today I expect to have ready a brief on the entire subject, which I am having prepared by experts on the subject of the treaty. The brief will go into some detail and point out exactly why the diversion of additional water at Chicago would constitute a violation of this treaty, not only in the judgment of Canada, but in the judgment of our own competent lawyers, who have competence and qualifications to judge questions of this kind.

Mr. President, unfortunately this is a one-sided debate. Our good friends who are proponents of the bill have the notion that, having put their case in the RECORD on the first day, they should not reply to our argument.

WITHHOLDING STATE INCOME TAXES FROM FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], I submit amendments to the bill (S. 2282) to amend the act of July 17, 1952, and I ask unanimous consent that they be held at the desk until the close of business tomorrow, September 2, in order that other Senators may join in their sponsorship, and that they be printed and lie on the table until the Senate takes up the bill.

The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Briefly, Mr. President, my amendments would delete that portion of the Finance Committee's amendment to S. 2282, the effect of which is to prohibit the Federal Government from withholding State income taxes from Federal employees who are not residents of the State whose income tax is being withheld. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a copy of the amendments, together with a letter dated July 28, 1959, from Fred C. Scribner, Jr., Acting Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Finance Committee reporting the Treasury Department's disapproval of the Finance Committee amendment. There are 17 States in which the Secretary of the Treasury has entered into agreements for withholding State income taxes from Federal employees. These are: Oregon, Vermont, Delaware, Arizona, Kentucky, Colorado, Maryland, Idaho, Montana, Alabama, Indiana, Massachusetts, New York, Utah, Oklahoma, Hawaii, and Alaska; also the District of Columbia. Agreements are in process of consummation with North Carolina and South Carolina.

There being no objection, the amendments and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 3, lines 9 and 10, strike out "and who are residents of such State or Territory."

On page 3, line 12, beginning with "A statement" strike out all through the period in line 16.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, July 28, 1959.

Hon. HARRY F. BYRD,
Chairman, Committee on Finance,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request, communicated by the chief of staff to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, for this Department's views on a proposal to add to the bill, S. 2282, a provision to prohibit Federal agencies from withholding State income taxes from the compensation of their employees who work in a State and are liable for its income tax but who do not live in that State.

The purpose of S. 2282 is to provide that agencies of the Federal Government shall not accept compensation for services performed in withholding State income taxes pursuant to agreements entered into between individual States and the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with the provisions of Public Law 587, 82d Congress. This objective is desirable in the interest of Federal-State reciprocity and good relationships between private employers and the Federal Government, since the Federal Government does not compensate States or private employers for services performed in withholding Federal taxes.

Eighteen States, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia now have withholding laws and several additional States are currently considering such legislation. Of these, only Massachusetts and Oklahoma provide for the compensation of employers. The Oklahoma statute is very recent and has not yet become effective. In Massachusetts, Federal agencies have been instructed to hold compensation in suspense accounts pending enactment of S. 2282. It is therefore desirable that S. 2282, which is believed to be noncontroversial, be enacted promptly.

In contrast, the proposed addition to S. 2282, which is totally unrelated to the purpose of the bill, is likely to prove controversial. We urge, therefore, that it be considered separately and that action be taken on S. 2282 on the merits of the purpose for which it is proposed.

The proposal to prohibit Federal agencies to withhold State income taxes from the compensation of their employees who do not live in the State in which they are employed, even though they are liable for such taxes by virtue of their earnings within the State, embodies a policy to which this Department is opposed. This proposal is apparently an outgrowth of differences which have developed between some States with and some States without individual income taxes. In the early days of State income taxation, provisions of State law varied with respect to the treatment of income received within the State by nonresidents. The authority to tax such income was settled by the Supreme Court 40 years ago in a case involving the Oklahoma income tax. Since then the State practice of taxing nonresidents on compensation received within the State has become almost universal and its legality accepted. This produces problems of double taxation, which are generally alleviated by States granting reciprocal credits for each other's taxes. The credit arrangements are of course inoperative in the case of nonresidents receiving compensation within an income tax State if their State of residence imposes no income tax. In these situations the employee pays no income tax to his home State which he can claim as a credit in his State of employment.

It will be noted that the proposal to prohibit withholding from Federal employees in these situations would not affect Federal employees' State tax liabilities, which are necessarily governed by State law. Enactment of the proposal would be interpreted as congressional intercession in behalf of one group of States to the handicap of another group of States, and at variance with long-established principles governing State tax jurisdiction. Indeed, enactment of the provision could be interpreted as an action to enable Federal employees to evade State taxes for which they are liable under State laws. Viewed in this light, the legislation would constitute a reversal of established congressional policy to cooperate with the States in the enforcement of their tax laws. Since the legislation would facilitate the avoidance of State taxes by some Federal employees, it would place these employees in a preferential status as compared with the employees of private employers, who are not afforded a similar Federal shelter from the collection of legally imposed State taxes. For these reasons, the Department would oppose legislation prohibiting Federal agencies from withholding State income taxes from the compensation of their employees who work in a State and are liable for its income tax but do not live in that State.

It appears unimportant to the Department whether a limitation on Federal withholding turns upon "residence" or upon "place of abode." The foregoing objections to the limitation would be the same in either case. Neither of these terms has a precise meaning, and problems of interpretation can be eliminated only to the extent that the intent is made clear.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Very truly yours,
FRED C. SCRIBNER, Jr.,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, before the amendments are sent to the desk, will the Senator from Massachusetts tell me if they are amendments to House bill 1?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. They are not. They are amendments to a technical bill which the Treasury Department has requested in connection with the withholding of local and State taxes by the Federal Government from Federal employees.

Mr. PROXMIRE. For a moment my hopes soared. I had hoped that the Senator's amendments were a compromise proposal which would solve the problem which has arisen between the proponents and opponents of House bill 1.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I appreciate the Senator's thought that the Senator from Massachusetts possessed sufficient wisdom to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator does have the requisite wisdom.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Illinois for a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did the Senator from Wisconsin obtain unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He received the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should like to inform my good friend from Minnesota that our mutual good friend from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is being a real martinet today, and is making it very difficult for us to extend the usual courtesies to our colleagues.

I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will indulge me to yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a few brief insertions in the RECORD.

I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield to the Senator from Minnesota for that purpose.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is my understanding that I can always yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Under what peculiar set of circumstances is it that the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois have the situation so well in hand that the business of government, aside from the water diversion bill, cannot be conducted?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Minnesota asks an excellent question. The Senator from Wisconsin is very eager to cooperate, but the Senator from Illinois refuses to permit him to do so.

Yesterday it was necessary for the Senator from Wisconsin to relinquish the floor entirely in order to permit the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] to make a brief speech. I would be glad to accommodate the Senator from Minnesota in the same way, if I possibly could. However, I find that if I relinquish the floor again, I shall have no further opportunity to speak on the pending amendment. This is an important amendment to me, so unfortunately I must decline to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Has the Senator any idea how the senior Senator from Minnesota, acting on behalf of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, might be able to file a report on an important piece of legislation, including both a majority report and minority views?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I believe that if the Senator from Minnesota, who is one of the most persuasive men I have ever known, would talk with the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Illinois would agree to permit unanimous consent for me to yield for 2 minutes or 1 minute—long enough to place this extremely important report before the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Wisconsin is, of course, aware of the fact that my affection and esteem for the Senator from Illinois is of such a degree that under no circumstances would I want to embarrass him. Therefore, of course, the Senator is aware of the fact that I would not want to ask for unanimous consent under those circumstances. Is that correct?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I presume that is correct. On the other hand, the Senator from Illinois has such a loving, generous, affectionate, and cooperative nature that I think a man of the talents of the Senator from Minnesota could prevail upon him to yield for just a few seconds in order to accomplish the request.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a further question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator have any idea as to when the Senator from Wisconsin will be through with his dissertation on this very important, vital amendment, and as to whether or not there will be a quorum call following that, so that if one were of an alert nature and quick of foot, and also somewhat quick of tongue, he might be able to get in on the discussion and be able to present his report and make a few insertions in the RECORD?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I reply to the Senator from Minnesota by saying that if the Senator from Illinois had not prevented the Senator from Wisconsin from yielding, by now the Senator from Minnesota would have got into the RECORD everything he wants to get into the RECORD; the Senator from Wisconsin would then have proceeded with his argument; and the Senate would have been much closer to a vote on H.R. 1.

On the other hand, there is a great deal of information which various Senators have asked us to put into the RECORD. The only explanation for the vote yesterday not to refer H.R. 1 to the Committee on Foreign Relations is that more debate is wanted. The Senate refused to table the bill and refused to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations for that reason.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is the Senator aware of the fact that one of the bills now on the Senate Calendar is the Blatnik-Humphrey water pollution bill, to extend sanitation facilities to communities as a public health measure?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was not aware of that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator believe that that would be good legislation?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have not had a chance to study it; but anything which is authored by the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota and the able Representative from Minnesota is excellent proposed legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator believe that an explanation of the proposed legislation, which would mean so much to the health of the American people and the public health facilities of the Nation, would be a documentation which would be a credit to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Indeed, I do.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a further question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator from Wisconsin recall that the senior Senator from Minnesota, some 10 days ago, addressed the Senate on the subject of the continuation of the nuclear test ban discussion at Geneva?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I well recall it. I wanted very much to engage in that discussion. One of the reasons why I did not is that I did not want to detain the Senate on H.R. 1. I wanted to get to a vote on this mesaure as soon as I could. There have been a number of occasions when I wanted very much to get into the debate, but I have hesitated to do so, so that we could have a vote on this measure as soon as possible.

I wanted to say at that time, and now I can say it, that I think the Senator from Minnesota did a marvelous job. I am deeply concerned with that matter, and I enthusiastically support the Senator's position in the matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is the Senator aware of the fact that one of the eminent, leading columnists of our country, the distinguished writer, Mr. Roscoe Drummond, severely criticized the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Minnesota and took exception to what appeared to the Senator from Minnesota to be points which were not really raised in the speech? Is the Senator aware of Mr. Drummond's column?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am aware of his column. I am not aware of his comment on this particular speech. I have been tremendously engrossed in the debate on H.R. 1, so I have not had an opportunity to study some of the very extremely important problems pending, and some of the pertinent columns which have been written on the subject to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would the Senator agree with me that a column which, although not intentionally, misrepresented or misinterpreted the point of view expressed by the senior Senator from Minnesota should be answered on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree 100 percent. I think it is extremely important that such columns be answered. Such columns are published all over the country and are read by, literally, millions of Americans. Unless the facts are set straight—and this great forum is the place to do it—many persons will be deceived and will make improper judgments on matters of the most crucial importance to the survival of the country.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator recall that in a speech relating to the Geneva Conference with respect to the prohibition of further nuclear tests, the senior Senator from Minnesota urged the President of the United States to announce that the ban on further testing would be continued until and at such time as the possibilities of any agreement were completely exhausted or proved futile?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I remember that very well. Once again, I commend the Senator from Minnesota for his position. It was a sensible, practical position, as well as one which was certainly in the great interest of humanity.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator from Wisconsin recall that the President of the United States subsequently announced that the moratorium on the further testing of nuclear weapons would be continued beyond the October 31 date and into the month of December?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is correct. It is my understanding that the moratorium has been extended by the other powers, so the effect of the Senator's suggestion has been that there will be a further suspension of nuclear tests, to the great benefit of mankind.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understand it, then, the Senator from Wisconsin joins with me in the belief that the action taken by the President is one which is commendable and one which will relate itself to a more constructive policy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a point of order. That is not a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend, so that the Senate may receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 53) to amend the acts approved April 16 and July 27, 1906 (34 Stat. 116 and 519), so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands on the Huntley reclamation project, Yellowstone County, Mont., to school district No. 24, Huntley Project Schools, Yellowstone County, Mont., with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2457) to provide equitable treatment for producers participating in the soil bank program on the basis of incorrect information furnished by the Government, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 24. An act to provide that certain real property of the United States situated in the State of Nevada shall be held in trust for members of the Fort McDermitt Paiute and Shoshone Tribe of Indians of the Fort McDermitt Indian Reservation, Nev.;

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. It is the understanding of the Chair that he may yield only for a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, is not a point of order in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a point of order?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask for a parliamentary ruling whether I have a right to refuse to yield for a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is not required to yield for a point of order if he does not desire to do so.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I will be happy to yield to the Senator from Illinois for a point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I make the point of order that the Senator from Wisconsin replied to a statement, not to a question, and that therefore he has lost his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he understood the Senator from Minnesota to ask a question. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Senator from Wisconsin may proceed.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am sure that anyone examining the RECORD or the transcribed notes of the Official Reporter will recognize that every vocal expression from the Senator from Minnesota was phrased in an interrogatory manner; and that every noun was preceded by a verb and every pronoun with a verb, which is the grammarian's way of asking a question. I do not know how anyone, particularly a man having the great learning, understanding, and professorial experience of the Senator from Illinois, could possibly misconstrue the very carefully phrased questions of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one final question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Would the Senator from Wisconsin be interested to know that I am deeply grateful to him for permitting this exchange this morning, under the questioning procedure relating to debate in the U.S. Senate?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Minnesota very much. I thought his questions were on issues of great moment and importance to the American people.

Mr. President, earlier today the Senator from Illinois placed in the RECORD a statement of some length in reply to the position of those of us who oppose the bill.

The statement or memorandum the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] submitted for the RECORD is extremely well written, as is everything that comes from him. It is a statement of competence and understanding. I think it probably makes as good a case as any that can be made against the arguments of those of us who oppose the bill.

Because the statement is of such importance, and because the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from New York, and other Senators have asked us to debate this matter, I do not know whether it can be fully and sufficiently called to the attention of the Senate except by having us go over the arguments set forth in the brief or memorandum and reply clearly and fully to them. So at this time I shall do so.

The memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois began by referring to the very issue which the Senator from Alabama raised yesterday, and on which the Senate as a whole, by means of the vote which was cast, seemed to tell Senators that more debate was desired on the question of whether the bill should be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

In the brief, the Senator from Illinois referred to that matter as follows:

> The Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Ohio—
> I believe he was referring to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE]— > have stated that the adoption of this legislation would be in disregard of a treaty of the United States with Canada. Both gentlemen know (or should know) that in the negotiations for the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty, a reservation was made for the diversion of water at Chicago, in the amount of 10,000 cubic feet per second. This was the reason for the disparity of 16,000 cubic feet per second in favor of Canada, in the distribution of water for power purposes at Niagara. Canada was allocated 36,000 cubic feet per second and the United States 20,000 cubic feet per second.
> The monetary value of this excess diversion to Canada, from 1910 to 1949, was about $172 million. The Chicago diversion averaged 5,238 cubic feet per second during this period, or about 53 percent of the 10,000 cubic feet per second reserved for it (p. 20–22 of hearings on H.R. 1 and S. 308).
> The matter of this reservation of 10,000 cubic feet per second of water for Chicago was adequately explained, to the Senate, in 1910 by Secretary of State Elihu Root, when the treaty was before the Senate for ratification. He stated that Lake Michigan was not a boundary water and he would not let them put anything in the treaty about Lake Michigan.

Mr. President, I submit that if the case is as good as was set forth there, the Senator from Illinois should have no objection to having this matter go to the International Joint Commission for decision.

Furthermore, Mr. President, it seems to me that the big point which is made by those of us who disagree with the Senator from Illinois—regardless of whether he is correct or whether he is incorrect, and even if we accept as correct every statement, every sentence, and every implication from what is set forth in the brief or memorandum the Senator from Illinois submitted—is that we also must recognize that Canada firmly and emphatically disagrees.

Mr. President, what happens when two good friends, two good neighbors, two sovereign nations, disagree under these circumstances, assuming, of course, that the United States accepts the position set forth in the memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois? Under those circumstances, we refer the matter to some sort of joint body or joint commission or some sort of arbitration procedure or world court or someone else who can settle the disagreement or controversy. The International Joint Commission was established for precisely that purpose.

In view of the fact that Canada vehemently objects, and has at least as much interest in this water as the United States does—at least in the whole Great Lakes watershed—it is our position that our country, as a good neighbor, should permit Canada to have some opportunity to protest, and should have the International Joint Commission or some similar body decide the matter.

In the brief or memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois, we next find the following:

The Chicago drainage canal had been constructed by 1900 to its flow capacity, 10,000 cubic feet per second, and its supply channel, the south branch of the Chicago River, was being improved to that same flow capacity. However, in 1900 the capacity of the Chicago River had been improved only to capacity to flow 5,000 cubic feet per second, without currents which would be obstructive to navigation. So, the permit from the Secretary of War to open the channel and cause the waters of the Chicago River to flow into the same, carried a limitation of 5,000 cubic feet per second in the flow. This was subsequently fixed at 4,167 cubic feet per second in December 1901.

By 1912, the Chicago River improvement had been completed to its planned flow capacity of 10,000 cubic feet per second, and in that year the Sanitary District of Chicago applied to the Secretary of War Stimson for a removal of the limitation of 4,167 cubic feet per second and for a permit to flow 10,000 cubic feet per second. Canada objected at the hearings before Secretary Stimson.

Mr. President, let us notice that Canada objected as long ago as 1912 to a change in the diversion.

I read further from the memorandum or brief submitted by the Senator from Illinois:

This objection was made despite the reservation of 10,000 cubic feet per second made just 3 years before, in 1909 treaty negotiations.

Mr. President, once again I point out that the most recent Canadian note was not in 1912, but was in 1959. Perhaps I should not say the most recent note, because there was one on August 21, 1959. But perhaps the most emphatic and most detailed objection by Canada was made last April; and at that time Canada made clear that she would consider the passage of this proposed legislation as constituting the breaking of understandings and agreements which had been made between the United States and Canada.

Once again I emphasize that this is the important point, regardless of whether the Senator from Illinois is correct or whether the Senator from Wisconsin is correct in regard to the proper interpretation of the treaty.

As I said earlier, at a later time today I expect to submit a brief which will place before the Senate the reason why I believe Canada is correct. But I say that even if every Senator should say that that brief is not convincing, and that the Senator from Illinois has taken the correct position in regard to this matter, I think that Senators still would be persuaded that, in view of the fact that Canada thinks she is correct and thinks that the United States is wrong, the Senate should not pass this bill until it has given some impartial and qualified body an opportunity to pass on this matter.

I say that, of course, because it cannot be emphasized enough that Canada is in a position to cut off the very lifeblood of the Northwest part of our country, by diverting the waters of the Columbia River, at or near its headwaters, to the Fraser River, so the Columbia River will flow directly into the Pacific Ocean, and not pass through Montana, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington at all. If that happened, it would tremendously reduce the supply of power obtained from the Columbia River at various points, particularly in Oregon and Washington. In fact, that could reduce the production of power there by 25 percent, and that would enormously hamper the Hanford atomic energy works and the considerable number of enormous dams which have been constructed in that part of the United States.

Mr. President, as I have stated, at a later time I shall return to this subject. But at this time I shall read further from the brief of memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois, as follows:

Secretary Stimson denied the request for an increase in the diversion and suggested that the sanitary district seek action in Congress. The sanitary district, however, elected to have its rights tried in the Federal court. Suit was filed by the Government in 1913, decided by the Supreme Court January 1925. The authority of the Secretary of War was upheld. The Secretary of War granted a permit, March 3, 1925, for a diversion of 8,500 cubic feet per second, in addition to domestic pumpage for 5 years. Canada did not object to this.

Mr. President, notice that in that instance the initiative was taken by the Sanitary District of Chicago. The brief submitted by the Senator from Illinois points out that the Sanitary District of Chicago did not elect to seek action in Congress, but, instead, chose to go to the Supreme Court of the United States. Evidently, the sanitary district felt then, as well as subsequently, that the Supreme Court should have jurisdiction over this matter of regulating or reducing or increasing or modifying the diversion on the basis of the quotas, as the Supreme Court might view them.

I read further from the memorandum:

The Lake States case then ensued from November 1926 to the Supreme Court decree of April 21, 1930.

The memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois does not state that at that time the Supreme Court limited the diversion to 1,500 cubic feet of water a second, plus domestic pumpage.

I read further from the brief submitted by the Senator from Illinois:

Canada took no part in this.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, it is very clear that from the very beginning, more than 50 years ago, the position of Canada has consistently been that any substantial diversion from Lake Michigan was of deep concern to Canada, and would have an adverse effect upon power production and navigation in Canada.

I read further from the memorandum submitted by the Senator from Illinois:

The United States has never failed to keep its word; and could not be charged with unilateral action now if it approved the pending legislation.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has brought up this point about having the United States keep her word. I am sure that he feels we could act and pass H.R. 1 and keep our word. I am sure he would not vote for it otherwise. Obviously other Senators agree with him.

On the other hand, it is clear that Canada disagrees; that she has a very intelligent and reasonable case. Whether one feels on balance that it is not merited, nevertheless it is a case which Canada has every reason to believe in.

Under those circumstances, it is perfectly apparent that if we pass this proposed legislation, Canada will think we have not kept our word; and, as the Senator from Illinois has indicated in his own brief, the record of the United States is keeping her word is of great importance. As he said, the United States has never failed to keep its word.

I want to say it is of great importance to me, as a U.S. Senator, whether or not Canada thinks we have kept our word. It is true that if Canada's protests were not based on any kind of sound reason or logic, if she were obviously insincere, we perhaps would have reason to act unilaterally; but when her protest is very reasonable, when it has the enthusiastic and emphatic support of eminent constitutional lawyers in this country, it seems to me it is very bad and very insulting to that country to refuse to abide by treaties, or at least refuse to submit this matter to arbitration, so that Canada's position or sovereignty can be respected.

The Senator from Illinois proceeds to say:

Chicago, in constructing the drainage canal and improving the Chicago River, was cooperating completely with the Federal Government in its efforts to develop a commercially useful waterway, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The study to be authorized by the pending legislation can determine what is needed to provide decent conditions for navigation in this Federal waterway. It is not for local sanitation.

If the Senator from Illinois wished to put that proposition to any jury of 12 persons in America, there is no question what the verdict would be.

He says:

The study to be authorized by the pending legislation can determine what is needed to provide decent conditions for navigation in this Federal waterway.

Where should we go to find out whether additional diversion can or cannot improve navigation in the waterway? We cannot go to the junior Senator from Wisconsin, because he has a biased point of view. I think if someone came to me, asking my opinion, since also I am not a qualified engineer, he would not be coming to the right person for an answer. For the same reason, a person going to the Senator from Illinois would not be going to the right person. He obviously has a reason for advancing this proposed legislation. He is not an objective expert, either. Neither of us is an expert in this matter.

Experts have testified before the Public Works Committee of the House or of the Senate, and they have testified at enormous length, to the extent of more than 1 million words of testimony in the record. I have only some of the hearings here; there are more. In all that abundance of testimony there is not one word of objective, impartial, qualified testimony to indicate that this diversion will be of any benefit to navigation on the Illinois Waterway.

As a matter of fact, there is the clearest kind of denial of such benefit, the most emphatic kind. Colonel Nauman, who is the representative of the Corps of Engineers, addressed the Public Works Committee and said that this diversion would be of no benefit to navigation. He has said so repeatedly. I do not at the moment have the specific reference to his testimony, but I will do my best to secure that reference and have it put in the RECORD at a later time. But the fact is that the experts have testified on this point. They say they know that the additional diversion would have no effect on navigation. They say the effect would be nil. The specific question was asked by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] last year, and the answer was that there would be no effect whatsoever.

So that argument by the Senator from Illinois has been answered in the most emphatic, the most expert, way.

I notice that in the very excellent address by this extremely competent Senator there is not one word of corroboration of the flat statement coming from the Senator from Illinois that the additional diversion would improve navigation on the Illinois Waterway.

The Senator from Illinois goes on to say:

Chicago is already conducting the largest and most complete sewage treatment operation that can be found in any large city in the world. It can do no more; and should be commended, not only for its effective efforts in matters of sanitation, but for its very important contributions to navigation.

That is all right. I think Chicago has worked hard. It has spent $400 million, or more, for sanitation. In many ways Chicago has done a good job. The fact is, however, that the expenditure of $400 million for Chicago and for the Chicago metropolitan district is not a very great investment per capita. As has been testified by the Senator from Illinois and others many times, there is a population of well over 4 million in this district, and it has an enormous industrial capacity, with fantastic industrial wealth. It is not a very great investment in terms of the enormous wealth of this area. There has been no showing it is a greater investment than any other city has made. The fact is Chicago is the only major city in the country—the only major city in the world, so far as I know—that takes water from one watershed, uses it for sanitation purposes, and then sends it down into an entirely different watershed, to the detriment of other States and another nation that is in the same watershed.

The Senator from Illinois goes on to discuss what I think is the best answer I have yet seen to the argument that has been made by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], and myself in a letter addressed to all Senators. I suggest that all Senators who are interested in this matter, and who have read the letter read the insertion the Senator from Illinois put in the RECORD. I think it is as competent an answer as one can get, but I think on every single point he is wrong and has not answered our position, and it shows that the position of the Senator from Illinois cannot be supported.

The Senator from Illinois has stated:

The actual diversion of additional water from Lake Michigan is necessary for a significant test. It has been suggested that the bill, H.R. 1, be amended to provide for the 3-year study without the authority for a 1-year additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second at Chicago. Except for the study of lake currents, and perhaps some other features, such a theoretical study would not reveal much more than has been already computed by sanitary engineers of the sanitary district.

Once again the Senator from Illinois makes a flat statement. There is no authority, no expert who is qualified, no objective authority, to support the notion that the 1,000 additional cubic feet of water per second is necessary.

Mr. President, this is the heart and soul of the bill. This is the only reason why Canada objects to it. Canada would go along with the study without the diversion.

The State of Ohio, the State of the distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], would go along with the proposal if there were no additional diversion. My State would go along with the proposal if there were no additional diversion.

If the statement of the Senator from Illinois were correct, one would think he would be able to get some corroboration of it. The reason the Senator cannot is that there is not any. The reason the Senator cannot is that, as we have said, both of the agencies which have expert understanding and knowledge have come before the committee to testify the other way. The testimony is very clear. It has been testified that the diversion is not necessary. That is covered in the majority report on page 6.

I think it is even more emphatically covered on page 13, so I will read a portion of the report, beginning at the bottom of page 12:

The Secretary of the Army would report the results of the study to Congress by June 1, 1962, with recommendations as to continuance of diversion in increased or decreased amounts.

A report entitled "Effect on Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River of an increase of 1,000 cubic feet per second in the diversion at Chicago," printed as Senate Document No. 28, 85th Congress, contains data pertaining to the effect of increased diversion on Lake Michigan and on navigation on the Illinois Waterway.

That means the expert on navigation, the expert on power, the expert on erosion of the lake shore, which is the Corps of Engineers, tells us the additional diversion is not needed. As a matter of fact, the proposed legislation is not needed at all to give us the answer.

The statement of the Senator from Illinois, that it is essential this be done, would seem to rely entirely on the sanitary aspects of the question, because that is the only aspect which is left.

What does the outstanding national expert on pollution tell us? That, of course, is the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, specifically the Public Health Service, and particularly Gordon McCallum, in charge of this matter for the Public Health Service.

I am not asking Senators to take the word of the Senator from Illinois or of the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Illinois is a wonderful man. He is a very honest and a very wise man. However, he is not qualified in this particularly technical area.

The statement of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is as emphatic as it can be. It is said that additional diversion is not necessary and, as a matter of fact, the recommendation is specifically against it. The Department agrees with the Bureau of the Budget that diversion should not be permitted. The Department agrees with the Bureau of the Budget that instead a study should be made of the sanitation problem, with no additional diversion. It is said that such a study could be conducted as easily without diversion as with diversion.

In view of all this, one would think the Senator from Illinois would be able to produce at least a single expert of some kind who would come before the Senate to testify that the additional diversion is necessary, but in the excellent answer of the Senator, which is so beautifully referenced and so compelling and persuasive, there is not a word, not an authority, not a reference.

I proceed to read from the brief of the Senator from Illinois:

In order to put the difficult sanitary situation of the Chicago metropolitan area into proper perspective, consider that this is probably the largest concentration of population and its resulting pollution which is not adjacent to an ocean or a large river; the latter conditions make sewage disposal comparatively easy. Chicago's position makes its waste disposal critical, difficult and expensive; probably the most difficult in the world. The Chicago Sanitary District has done an extraordinary job toward solving this problem; it has constructed and operates the largest and most advanced sewage treatment facilities in the world in order to give what is usually accepted as complete treatment. However, this nominally complete treatment is not dependable for more than about 90 percent removal of polluting material. The untreated residual, equivalent to the raw sewage from a city with a population of approximately 800,000, cannot be put back into the lake without seriously contaminating its water supply and bathing beaches as has recently been experienced on a small scale by Milwaukee, Toronto, Cleveland, and other Great Lakes cities.

Mr. President, I think this is an interesting argument of the Senator from Illinois, but I submit it is totally irrelevant. The people who are best qualified to pass on this problem have already informed the Senate, through the Committee on Public Works—and their testimony is before us—that they do not need additional diversion to make a study as to whether the way to solve this admittedly perplexing problem for Chicago is to divert an additional 1,000 cubic feet of water per second, or to try other methods, such as aeration, chlorination, stopping pollution at the source, or what not.

The alternative is to discharge the effluent, with its residual pollution, into the Illinois Waterway, as is now being done. However, the Illinois Waterway has inadequate dilution capacity to absorb the residual pollution. The result is an unpleasant environmental condition for some distance below the city of Joliet. Also, the city of Peoria, which has a critical shortage of domestic water, is planning to use Illinois River water, but is faced with considerable difficulty in treating this water to obtain an acceptable degree of safety.

Mr. President, once again I state, How does one solve this kind of problem? One solves it not on the basis of whether one likes and respects, as so many of us do, the distinguished Senator from Illinois and the very fine Representative, who is such a powerful and influential member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, Mr. O'BRIEN; but instead one solves it based on what the experts tell us is correct. The fact is that the Senator from Illinois has stated the case quite well, but when we come to consider the answer, the only authority the Senator can give for his position is his own. The Senator cannot cite a single qualified expert who is objective to support the position he has taken.

The Senator goes on to say:

Thus Chicago is in a position which can be remedied only by unusual sanitary measures or by moving its location. Studies of Chicago's problem will be useful to other Great Lakes cities, and the results may save them many deaths and their governments much criticism as their populations increase in step with the commercial growth resulting from the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Mr. President, I expect to go into some detail later as to the health situation, but at this point I should like to say that Chicago has had this problem for a great many years. As a matter of fact, Chicago has had the problem since the Civil War. Chicago has solved the problem, or has tried to solve the problem, by diverting the water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway since about the turn of the century. One would think that by now there would be some kind of a statistical record on the health of the people of Chicago which would corroborate the contention that there is a great deal of illness—amebic dysentery, or some other illness—as a result of pollution, which would persuade us that there is a health menace.

The fact is that Chicago is a city where the people are among the most healthy in the country, on the basis of statistics which I will later put in the RECORD. A very careful and exhaustive study has been made of the incidence of various waterborne diseases. Chicago does extremely well on a per capita basis, as compared with any other major city anywhere.

So, Mr. President, the argument that there is a terrible health problem for Chicago, with people dying like flies and people getting ill, can be disproved easily by simply looking at the facts. There is not a health problem for Chicago. No showing has been made that there is a health problem for Chicago.

In all of the years that this matter has been before the Congress, the Senator from Illinois and the Representative from Illinois, both of whom are such extremely competent men, have failed to bring before the Congress a single health expert to demonstrate there is a health problem.

I have in my hand something which I intend to bring to the attention of the Senate later. It is the most definitive study ever made of the health problems of any community. It is a Chicago health survey, made in 1947, which goes into this problem in great detail and which, as a matter of fact, recommends against additional diversion of water.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois proceeds in his remarks, which he put in the RECORD this morning, to say:

Specifically, this actual diversion for 1 year is necessary to a really significant test because there are factors such as temperature, degree of undersaturation, rate of utilization, and coefficient of absorption which either must be determined for the actual conditions or are seasonal, thereby requiring a full year of data.

Mr. President, I ask Senators: How many men in this body are experts on the rate of utilization and the coefficient of absorption? I can hardly pronounce those words.

I submit that this is not the proper kind of decision for U.S. Senators to have to make. We should be able to turn to competent, qualified experts and ask them, "What is the answer?" We have done that, and they come back unanimously and say, "The answer is that additional diversion is not needed to make a study."

They say that unanimously. There is no question about it. So the argument of the Senator from Illinois that there are coefficients of absorption and undersaturation and all kinds of complicated developments that can only be studied by a 1,000 cubic feet per second diversion for a year it seems to me is answered completely by the fact that the people who understand these matters, who have devoted a lifetime to them, who have been qualified through their education, through their training, and through their experience to pass on these matters, say, "Additional diversion is not needed."

The Senator goes on to say:

Temperature effects are important because the saturation level of oxygen dissolved in water decreases with increases in temperature; for fresh water this saturation level is 14.6 parts per million at 32° F., 9 parts per million at 70° F., and 7.3 parts per million at 90° F., These are subject to variation due to different amounts of pollution in the water. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.

The degree of undersaturation is the difference between the actual amount of oxygen dissolved in the water and the saturation level. The rate of absorption of oxygen varies inversely as the degree of undersaturation.

After all, Mr. President, we are supposed to pass on this kind of extremely complex, highly technical, very specialized material. Obviously no Senator is going to read the record and come to some kind of judgment as to whether additional diversion is necessary. What he is going to do, what any intelligent person will do, is to go to a technical expert whom we can trust and say, "What is the answer?"

Nobody has challenged the integrity or honesty of the Public Health Service in this matter. They do not have any ax to grind.

As we have pointed out, the unmistaken leader of the Republican Party in the U.S. Senate is a leading proponent of this bill. He has used great influence, and he has been very effective in getting support for this bill.

If this were a matter of partisanship I should think that the administration would take a position and tell their agencies to take a position for the bill and against our position. Obviously the administration has not done this, because the experts uniformly and unanimously have told the Public Works Committee that additional diversion is not necessary.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the Senator yield for an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Arkansas for an insertion, and that I shall not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the junior Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Illinois for so graciously yielding to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. For so graciously not objecting to my unanimous-consent request that I yield to the Senator from Arkansas. I know that only his great affection for the Senator from Arkansas persuaded him to do this, because a number of fine Senators who are very close friends of the Senator from Illinois have been denied the floor. Only the Senator from Arkansas has been permitted to have the floor by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I appreciate very much this sign of generosity on the part of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The only other way I can understand this unusual courtesy is that the Senator from Illinois has mellowed. I have not taken very long on this speech, but perhaps as time has passed, the factor of time and consideration has persuaded him that perhaps in the future it would be perfectly all right to cooperate, and that it is unnecessary to object to these courtesies we extended to our good friends in the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas appear elsewhere in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois went on to say:

> The rate utilization of oxygen, by the dissolved and suspended organic matter in the water, is affected by temperature, nature of the pollution, and amount of mixing which takes place. This rate of utilization affects the degree of undersaturation. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.
> The coefficient of absorption is an empirical factor which is applied to other factors in determining the rate at which oxygen goes into solution in the water; it is effected by the quantity and nature of impurities in the water, and the amount of mixing which results from the velocity of flow and characteristics of the stream bed. Additional diversion is necessary to test these effects.

Is it? Is it? I submit that whether it is necessary or not is a question for Gordon McCallum to answer, a question for the Public Health Service to answer, a question for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to answer, a question for qualified, dispassionate, objective experts who understand this matter, who are not representatives of Illinois or Chicago or of Wisconsin or Ohio, but men who have devoted their whole lives to this matter, who understand it, and who say unanimously and with one voice, "Additional diversion is not necessary," contrary to what our distinguished friend from Illinois says.

> Another feature, about which there has been much speculation but to which only an actual test can supply the answer, is whether or not an additional amount of fresh water would sufficiently dilute the concentrated nitrogenous material carried into the Illinois River from the treated sewage effluent to reduce the excessive growth of algae and obnoxious water plants.
> In summary, the actual additional diversion is necessary to supply data on the several empirical factors which are necessary to determine if this method would provide the necessary relief for this overall public health problem and for a desirable improvement in conditions of navigation.

Indeed it is the overall public health problem. And who decides the overall public health problem? The Senator from Illinois? He has given us his partisan opinion on it, and it is a very good one, but I am sure that any Senator who wants to decide this on the merits is going to consider primarily in this technical field as to whether this public health problem can be solved by asking the experts of the Public Health Service, whose whole training, background, and education qualify them to give them an answer, and their position assures us that they will give us an answer that is unbiased, that is objective, that is fairminded, as well as qualified.

Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois proceeds to state something on the theoretical power loss, that is quite interesting to me, although again it is a little technical. He argues that the total flow in the St. Lawrence is 240,000 cubic feet per second. The maximum reduction of flow in the St. Lawrence is about 220 cubic feet per second. Here he quotes a Smith, at page 408, for 210 cubic feet per second, and Ramey, page 345, for 220 cubic feet per second. I do not know who Smith is. There is no identification of Smith, other than his name. I presume he is an authority, but there are many Smiths in America, and I submit that this could be almost anyone.

The second authority, Mr. Ramey, is a fine man; and I understand—I ask the Senator from Illinois to correct me if I am wrong—he is an employee of the Metropolitan Chicago Sanitary District. I ask the Senator from Illinois to correct me if I am wrong, or to shake his head if he does not wish to delay me. Is Mr. Ramey an employee of the Metropolitan Chicago Sanitary District?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Ramey was the chief engineer of the Chicago Sanitary District, but he is now retired. He is one of the most eminent sanitary engineers in the world.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is he a consulting engineer?

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I was about to ask unanimous consent that my friend from Illinois could shake his head, in the affirmative or in the negative, without the Senator from Wisconsin losing his right to the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator from Illinois tell me whether or not Mr. Ramey is now a consulting engineer?

Mr. DOUGLAS. He was the chief engineer of the sanitary district, but he is now retired. He is an independent engineer.

Mr. PROXMIRE. On that basis, I think it is pretty clear that Mr. Ramey, while a very well qualified man, is a man who speaks on the basis of his former connections and interests, and his whole association of a lifetime. Therefore his testimony, while given weight, should be considered in the same category with the testimony of the Senator from Illinois, that is, the testimony of a person who has a specific interest.

The Senator from Illinois continues:

> This maximum reduction is about one-tenth of 1 percent of total flow.
> After diversion has been in effect for 1 year and diversion has ceased, the recovery in water levels and flow quantities will start.
> The reduction in flow at Massena will be about as follows—

I will not delay the Senate by reading each of these figures, but it is interesting to note that the Senator from Illinois speaks with absolute authority. He does not say that he thinks the reduction will be about as follows; he says it will be. He knows what the effect of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second diversion will be. In that event, why have the diversion as a concomitant of the test? Why not have the study without the diversion? If the Senator from Illinois already knows the effect of the diversion, why indulge in an action which is vigorously protested by the sovereign nation of Canada, and by six of our States, as well as by many Senators?

> It, therefore, has accepted the loss at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence as $608,000.

Without stipulating as to that loss, I should say, on the basis of information I have seen, that it is far greater. New York emphatically says it is greater, and furnishes competent evidence that it is greater.

Without questioning that figure, the point is that the Senator from Illinois has now told the Senate that there will be a power loss.

As I have said before, a great Senator has told me that if I could show him that there would be as much as $1 loss to any State for the benefit of another, he would vote against the bill.

I do not have to argue the question of loss. The Senator from Illinois has done it for us. The Senator from Illinois has said there will be a loss at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence of $608,000. He continues:

> Subtracting the gain in hydroelectric power at the Lockport plant of $67,000 would leave a net loss of $541,000 over the 15-year period during which the 1-year diversion would have an effect.

That is very interesting. New York loses $608,000. As I understand, the Senator from Illinois has just said—and I hope he will shake his head if I am wrong—that the Metropolitan Sanitary District owns or controls the power installation at Lockport. I presume I am right. The benefit at Lockport would accrue to the Metropolitan Sanitary District. In other words, we are giving them at least $67,000, on the basis of the testimony of the Senator from Illinois himself, which comes out of the pocket of New York and goes into the pocket of the Chicago Sanitary District. There is no question about it.

Of course, the loss to Canada is an admitted loss, too.

The Senator from Illinois continues:

> This is an annual loss of $36,000 which the committee considers to be infinitesimal in comparison to the $50 million a year estimated gross annual value of the output of the U.S. plants at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence (p. 10, H. Rept. No. 191, 86th Cong., 1st sess., "Diversion of Water from Lake Michigan").

The $36,000 figure is very much disputed. It is vigorously disagreed to.

Furthermore, the whole point of the test is based upon whether or not there is a permanent diversion. I think the Senator from Illinois would agree that a permanent diversion, instead of losing $36,000, would result in a great deal higher loss.

I think it can be conclusively shown, by the evidence which I hope to place in the RECORD at a later time, that the economic loss would be far greater than the economic benefit. This is a matter of economics. There is no question, on the basis of the evidence we have so far, that Chicago could solve its problem by the use of alternative methods—by aeration, chlorination, restricting pollution at its source, or by some other method of that kind—costly, but nevertheless practical and possible.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Ohio, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in the report filed by the division engineer of the North-Central Division, Corps of Engineers of the U.S. Army, on page 43, paragraph 146, there appears the following statement:

> In the United States and in Ontario it is considered that the decrease in available hydroelectric energy that would result from a permanent increase in diversion could best be evaluated in terms of the cost of alternative generation in modern, efficient, thermal plants, currently estimated at 2.87 mills per kilowatt-hour. The monetary value of the loss of 246,800,000, kilowatt-hours of energy in the United States and Ontario plants is computed to be about $708,000 annually.
> Information is not available as to the appropriate basis for evaluating the decrease in hydroelectric energy that would result in Quebec. The total computed annual loss in energy at the United States and Ontario plants represents 81 percent of the total computed annual loss in energy at Niagara and St. Lawrence River plants resulting from a permanent increase in diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan. The value of the corresponding gain at the Lockport plant on the Illinois Waterway of 23,500,000 kilowatt-hours, would be about $67,000 annually. A monetary value has not been placed on the theoretical losses or gain in dependable capacity.

Is it not a fact that this study, made by the Corps of Army Engineers, shows that a definite loss of $708,000 would be suffered by the United States and Ontario hydroelectric generating plants, and a gain of $67,000 annually would be enjoyed by the Lockport-Chicago drainage-canal-operated generating plant?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I say that the answer is emphatically "Yes." I say that, recognizing the testimony of the Senator from Illinois, who is, as I have said, an honorable man and a wise man. But I think in this case, as I have shown, the authorities he has quoted are Horace P. Ramey, a fine man, but whose advice in this case is not correct, and a fellow named Smith, who is not otherwise identified except that his last name is Smith.

The Senator from Ohio has cited, on the other hand, the unquestioned authority in the country, the Corps of Engineers. I know of no one in all the hearings we have had who has questioned the integrity, the competence, the accuracy, or the ability of the Corps of Engineers to give us a final, accurate answer in this matter.

So, in view of what the Senator from Ohio has said, it seems to me this is a complete answer to the point made by the Senator from Illinois. I think any fairminded person would say there may be some reason for the metropolitan district engineers arriving at the conclusion they did reach; but the fact is that the Corps of Engineers will be honest with Congress. They will tell us the facts as they see them. They have no political ax to grind. They do not take any position on the bill. They simply wish to give a competent, honest, correct answer. They say the loss will be $708,000 annually—not over 15 years, but annually.

I think the different points of view may be reconciled—perhaps I am wrong—by saying that Corps of Engineers may be talking about a permanent diversion. If that is the case, I think we can reconcile both these points of view and say that the Senator from Illinois is correct in what he has said here, and that our position is correct, too, because that difference would be approximately what one would expect under those circumstances.

But the point the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin are making is that what we are using is a study to determine whether the permanent diversion is necessary. No one has the slightest interest in the effect of a temporary diversion, except in this ad hoc instance, and everyone who is an expert tells us a temporary diversion is not wanted.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that all that has been said on the floor of the Senate by the proponents of the bill definitely establishes that while they ask for a 1-year diversion of water to make a pretended test, what they really contemplate is a permanent diversion of 1,000 cubic feet a second?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am sure that they earnestly hope to get it. That is their objective. I am positive that if this were not their objective, they would not even have dreamed of introducing the proposed legislation. I am sure they want it. I think it is pretty clear in their remarks in the debate and elsewhere that they have every expectation of getting it.

They have said, over and over again, that if the test shows this cannot be supported economically or on some other ground, they will be the first to admit it and will not introduce any further proposed legislation.

Our answer is that this is not a fair test. The Public Health Service says it is not a fair test, or at least that it is not necessary. The Bureau of the Budget recommends a different kind of test. We feel that a fair test would put all alternatives on an equal basis, and the proposed legislation does not do that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not also a fact that based upon impartial, objective studies made by the Corps of Army Engineers throughout the years, the Corps of Engineers has stated that we have the information covering what the lowering of the lake levels will be, and we need not make any further study; that we have that information now at hand. It is contained in the reports which have been submitted to us. Is not that a fact?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is an absolute fact. The Corps of Engineers has said that in the most emphatic, clearest kind of language. They say, as a matter of fact, on page 13 of the committee report:

> Accordingly, legislation is not necessary to obtain data in relation to those items.

The antecedent of "those items" is the lake levels and the effect on navigation and power on the Great Lakes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the Senator from Wisconsin aware of the fact, if I may ask permission to read from the committee report——

Mr. PROXMIRE. The report of the majority.

Mr. LAUSCHE. That the report of the majority included a letter which was sent to the committee by the Corps of Army Engineers?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Corps of Engineers says it has made studies and can give us figures; that another test need not be made. Is not that the fact, if I may ask the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is a fact. The Senator from Ohio is correct. If I may reply at a little greater length to the question of the Senator from Ohio, the study of the Corps of Engineers reports:

> That the 1,500 cubic feet per second of direct diversion presently entering the waterway pursuant to the decree of April 21, 1930, is sufficient to sustain navigation was borne out by the report made by the division engineer, North Central Division Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army, in January 1957 on the subject "Effects of an Additional Diversion of Water from Lake Michigan at Chicago," and published as Senate Document No. 28 of the 85th Congress, 1st session. At paragraph 184 it is stated:

"184. Commerce on the Illinois Waterway has increased from a total of 1,695,120 tons in 1935 to 21,362,852 tons in 1955, the latest year for which statistics have been compiled. Recent studies of present and prospective water requirements for navigation on the Illinois Waterway show that the authorized diversion of 1,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan is adequate to meet those requirements."

Let me read the last sentence again:

Recent studies of present and prospective water requirements for navigation on the Illinois Waterway show that the authorized diversion of 1,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan is adequate to meet those requirements.

I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact, then, that from the standpoint of the impairment of electrical generating capacity, if this plan of Chicago is accomplished by the action of the Senate and is made an ultimate reality, all of the hydroelectric generating plants along the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River will suffer financial loss, while Chicago will be the only one to enjoy a profit?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is absolutely correct. There is no question about it. The Senator from Illinois agrees. He has said so.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator from Illinois agree to that? May I ask the Senator from Illinois, without causing the Senator from Wisconsin to lose the floor, if the accomplishment of this proposal will mean that all the power generating plants will suffer a loss, but that Chicago will profit?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois is completely silent. I can only construe the silence of this most eloquent man to mean that he agrees that Chicago will gain, and the other States will lose.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for another question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. On the subject of navigational benefits, is it not a fact that the Corps of Army Engineers, based upon recent studies and statistical information gathered during the last 50 years, reported that if this proposed diversion is granted and finally becomes permanent, the water level of Lake Erie will drop five-eighths of an inch, and the level of Lakes Michigan and Huron will drop 1 inch?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding. I believe those figures are correct, and it would be hard to dispute them in view of the fact that they come from the Corps of Engineers.

I may say, however, that the position of the proponents of the bill is: "What is an inch? What is five-eighths of an inch?" The answer is that 1 inch or five-eighths of an inch means literally hundreds of thousands of dollars in power losses and hundreds of thousands of dollars in navigation losses. There will also be other damage such as that which will be done to recreational facilities.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If I may ask another question without the Senator from Wisconsin losing the floor, looking at the situation from the standpoint of financial loss through the impairment of navigational capacity, is it not a fact that the Corps of Army Engineers points out in dollars what that loss will be to the American and Canadian users of the Great Lakes?

Mr. PROXMIRE. They do, indeed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has anyone disputed the fact that there will be financial loss?

Mr. PROXMIRE. No one has. I think many Senators do not realize that. It is unfortunate. But I think if Senators realized that fact and also that this proposal would take money from the citizens of one State and, in effect, give it to the citizens of another State, I am sure Senators would say, on principle, that regardless of anything else in the bill, they could not vote for it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in understanding that if this bill is passed and is enacted into law, first, from the standpoint of electricity or power, property rights will be taken from all of the States and from the Dominion of Canada, bordering on the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence Seaway, and will be given to Chicago; and does the same principle apply with reference to the subject of transportation on the Great Lakes?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct. The subject of transportation on the Great Lakes of course is of immense importance, in view of the construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and in view of the enormous expenditures which Cleveland, Milwaukee, and many other ports on the Great Lakes have made to dredge and to provide access for the large oceangoing steamers. This waterway is the very lifeblood that has made Cleveland, Milwaukee, and other cities in the area ocean ports.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin understand that this year the Congress will have appropriated $31 million to be used in dredging the Great Lakes, so to make them better usable for transportation?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That figure does not surprise me. Although I may be mistaken, I believe that Canada has appropriated many times that amount for the St. Lawrence Seaway. In view of the fact that Canada is not as wealthy as our country and does not have nearly so large a population as does our country, one can well realize that Canada feels very deeply and very strongly that what she has built at great cost to herself should not be the subject of a refusal by the United States to consider the Canadian protest or even to let the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, the only committee of this body competent to pass on treaties, so much as look at the bill. Certainly such a position by our country would seem to me to be an insult to our good neighbor, Canada.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question, but only for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes. One of my colleagues——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is the Senator from Ohio asking a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, I am. Will the Senator from Wisconsin please answer this question: Yesterday, a Senator, after he had voted, said to me that he voted in the manner in which he did because he wanted to spare Chicago from a health endangering epidemic, and said that he understood that unless this water was made available in Chicago, then, on the basis of what the Department of Health had said, Chicago would be struck with a menace to health. What are the facts with reference to that understanding, based upon the reports we have had, and based upon the expert opinions?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The facts are—and later in my remarks I expect, if I have an opportunity to do so, to place in the RECORD the documentation of the facts—that Chicago is one of the very healthiest cities in the world; and the Chicago authorities have said so, and have said that Chicago has an excellent health record, particularly as regards waterborne diseases. There is no statistical evidence or any other evidence of any kind that a health problem exists at Chicago. As I shall later show when I quote quite extensively from the book which is a study of the situation at Chicago and in Cook County—a book of some 1,200 pages, and it constitutes the greatest health survey of the situation at Chicago or in Canada or elsewhere in that part of the world—the problem can be solved without additional diversion.

Furthermore, the Public Health Service, which is the competent, qualified, unbiased expert on this matter, says the same thing.

So it seems to me that any Senator who says this is a matter which involves the health of the people of Chicago will vote against the proposed additional diversion, because all the health experts say the study can be made without permitting additional diversion, and all of them say that the additional diversion will serve no health purpose.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not fair to assume that if a health matter were involved, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare of the U.S. Government, with its responsibility to protect the health of the people of the country, would be the first to urge that the Congress provide for this diversion?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am absolutely sure the Department would do so, particularly since the distinguished minority leader, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], who is a very fine Senator, and is the spokesman of the administration in this body, could—in view of his great interest in and his support of this measure—if there were any merit in it, get the Public Health Service to support it. Heaven knows, under those circumstances, the Public Health Service as an agency of the administration would give the bill as much support as it could; and I am sure it has done all it could to consider the merits of this proposal. After all, the Public Health Service has the responsibility of caring for the health of the Nation, and it is dedicated to that service. Those in the Public Health Service have devoted their entire lives to protecting the public health. They have made that a crusade. Undoubtedly, they could earn larger salaries in other occupations; but they have chosen to serve in the Public Health Service. And their answer is that the diversion is not needed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, in other words, the Department of Health——

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was referring to the Public Health Service, of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In other words, that agency has not urged us to authorize this diversion; but, instead, it submitted a report——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is the Senator from Ohio asking a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, I am—but it sent in a report specifically stating that this diversion is not necessary for health purposes?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I must protest; that was not a question. Instead, it was a statement. I must ask that the Senator from Wisconsin be declared to have lost the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio made perfectly clear, by the inflection of his voice, that he was asking a question. In fact, I interrupted him, and asked whether he was asking a question; and he said he was. He asked whether that statement was correct; and my reply was that it was correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, an examination of the RECORD will show that the statement of the Senator from Ohio was not grammatically in the form of a question. The Senator from Wisconsin has replied to it; and I ask that the Senator from Wisconsin be declared to have lost his right to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin asked me specifically whether I was asking a question; and my reply was "yes." And the question was put in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The Chair wishes to state that the Senator from Wisconsin can yield only for an interrogation. If he persists in yielding, the Senator from Wisconsin must make sure that he yields only for questions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask for a ruling in regard to whether the Senator from Ohio asked a question or made a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to advise that the Senator from Ohio prefaced his words with the statement that he was asking a question. If at one point he veered from that understanding, the Senator from Illinois should have made his point there.

The Chair would like to advise the Senator from Wisconsin that he may yield only for a question.

From now on, the Chair is going to be very careful to make sure that only questions are asked of the Senator who has the floor. Under the rule, a Senator who has the floor may yield only for a question; otherwise, the point of order may properly be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Chair rule on whether the Senator from Wisconsin has lost his right to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has not yet lost the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I continue to read from the very fine brief or argument the Senator from Illinois earlier today inserted in the RECORD, and which I am attempting to answer point by point.

On the last page of his argument or memorandum, the Senator from Illinois tried to meet this question:

> Does the Supreme Court have authority to increase the diversion?

The statement submitted by the Senator from Illinois sets forth, in reply, the following:

> It is our understanding that the Supreme Court, in the case now pending before it, may have authority to increase the flow of water in the Illinois Waterway.
> However, no constitutional lawyer of any consequence—

Believe me, Mr. President, those are the words of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]; they are not my words—> would say that this ousts Congress of its jurisdiction under the commerce clause. The Senate is not required to abdicate its power over navigation because a matter is pending before the Supreme Court, and in the famous Wheeling Bridge case Congress specifically reversed a decree of the Court, and the Court ruled properly so.

Mr. President, I submit that the Supreme Court has jurisdiction, and the argument of the Senator from Illinois in this matter seems to me not to be pertinent in view of the fact that the Supreme Court is perfectly free to give additional diversion. As recently as 1956 it gave additional diversion, not the 1,000 feet extra, but 6,000 feet extra.

So the point made by the Senator from Illinois in this regard, it seems to me, does not stand up. The fact is that the Supreme Court, ever since at least the turn of the century, and certainly since the study made by Charles Evans Hughes and the report made by him in 1930, has insisted it has jurisdiction over this matter, that it can decide whether, with all the equities concerned, the interests of Canada, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, New York, Vermont, the rights and the needs of Chicago should take precedence over the perfectly legitimate and just needs of navigation and power on the Great Lakes.

The Supreme Court has acted—and I do not see how anybody can question it—on the basis of fairness, justice, intelligence, and understanding. It has acted impulsively. Nobody has accused the Court of being arbitrary or political. It has acted obviously on the basis of the most competent and comprehensive understanding. For the Senator from Illinois to say Congress can step in and authorize the Court in doing so seems to me wrong on the whole history of the question.

The Senator from Illinois went on to say:

> Congress authorized this present diversion in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1950 and there is no argument that continued exercise of Court authority destroys the power of Congress.
> There is no pleading now before the Court specifically asking for more water.

That is simply because the sanitary district is not asking for it. After all, it is hardly the fault of Ohio, Wisconsin, or Canada that Chicago is not asking for more water if it needs it. It is the fault of the Chicago Sanitary District. It has gotten water before by asking for it. The Supreme Court has shown that, if it feels it is justified, it is perfectly willing to grant additional water if it is requested.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that about a year ago there was a drought condition in that area and the city of Chicago went to the Supreme Court, related to it the fact that there was a drought and that water was needed, and the Supreme Court granted a temporary right to divert more water?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is absolutely correct. I was trying to get across the point that in 1956 the city of Chicago went to the Supreme Court and said, "We need additional water, a temporary additional diversion," and the Court granted the diversion. In fact, the Court authorized 8,000 cubic feet per second, instead of the increase of 2,500 feet Chicago is now asking.

Obviously, the Supreme Court has shown that, when there is merit, it will grant the additional water needed.

I should like to quote from a statement by the power authority of the State of New York in a brief that was filed. Reading from page 11:

> In November 1956, Illinois petitioned the Supreme Court for a temporary modification of the decree of April 21, 1930, so as to increase the diversion to 10,000 cubic feet per second for a period of 100 days to relieve a critical navigation emergency on the Mississippi River due to unprecedented drought conditions. In an amicus curiae memorandum on behalf of the United States, the Court was informed that the Corps of Engineers had expressed the opinion that the proposed diversion would serve to alleviate the emergency.
> All the complainant States except Wisconsin—
> My State protested—
> agreed to a temporary increase in the diversion because of the navigation emergency. Their agrement, however, was without prejudice to the positions they had consistently taken in opposition to Illinois' efforts to increase the diversion [permanently].

The word "permanently" is my word. I continue to read:

> On December 17, 1956, the Court temporarily modified the April 21, 1930, decree to permit diversion until January 31, 1957, at 8,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage, without prejudice to the rights of the parties (Wisconsin v. Illinois, 352 U.S. 945).
> At the same time that Illinois petitioned in 1956 for this temporary modification of the 1930 decree, the sanitary district again moved the Court for clarification of that decree so as to provide that the Congress could determine and authorize the amount of diversion required. On motion of the complainant States the Supreme Court on December 17, 1956, denied the sanitary district's petition for clarification of the decree.

Let me read that paragraph again. This is a direct and immediate answer to the Senator from Illinois' statement that Congress has some kind of concurrent jurisdiction, that Congress' action will help the Supreme Court, that the Supreme Court wants Congress to authorize the diversion. Here is what the Supreme Court actually said:

At the same time that Illinois petitioned in 1956 for this temporary modification of the 1930 decree, the sanitary district again moved the Court for clarification of that decree so as to provide that the Congress could determine and authorize the amount of diversion required. On motion of the complainant States the Supreme Court on December 17, 1956, denied the sanitary district's petition for clarification of the decree.

Mr. President, what could be clearer? The Supreme Court said, "We have jurisdiction." The sanitary district has said, "Let Congress decide it." The Supreme Court has said, "No. We will decide it on the basis of riparian rights and the legal problems involved," and I think the Supreme Court was dead right.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that the decision of the Supreme Court rendered in the 1956 proceeding was completely predicated upon the decision which the Supreme Court rendered in 1930, fixing the volume of water which Chicago had the right to divert?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Absolutely, and that is a most important point. The Supreme Court has not varied from that 1930 decree. As a matter of fact, in flat contradiction and usurpation of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, this proposed legislation would say that we are going to violate that decree of 1930 and say that what the Supreme Court has decided is invalid; "we say 2,500 cubic feet per second and the Supreme Court can peddle its papers elsewhere."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that the Supreme Court in 1930, after it had listened to the arguments of the States downstream and downlake from Chicago, and I think those uplake and upstream from Chicago, decided that Chicago be permitted to take out the natural water needed for domestic purposes, which amounted to about 1,800 cubic feet per second, and 1,500 feet to be used in the drainage canal?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that from 1930 to this very day the Supreme Court has stood firm in its decision that the removal of more than 3,300 cubic feet of water per second would economically, unlawfully, and wrongfully damage the States downstream?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct. That is another point which has been generally overlooked.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that we generally overlook the fact that the city of Chicago has gone to the Supreme Court, has complained that the decision was wrong, and that the Supreme Court time and again and repeatedly has told Chicago, "You are taking property from other States, which belongs to them, and trying to use it for yourself"?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct. There is no question about it. Anyone who studies the legal history of this situation can come to only that conclusion.

What the proposed legislation would do is ignore and usurp the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, which it has in the past asserted, by insisting that Congress is going ahead regardless of the position of the Supreme Court.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, is it not a further fact that when the Supreme Court rendered its decision in 1930 it declared it would keep the case before it, to see if conditions changed; and it further stated that, if conditions changed, it would consider the changed conditions? Furthermore, the Supreme Court directed the city of Chicago to file reports with the Supreme Court, showing what water was taken and what was being done with it?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin know whether the city of Chicago has complied with that order as to filing reports?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is no question about the fact that the city of Chicago has not complied with the order. The last report was filed in 1939, 20 years ago; so the city of Chicago is delinquent on some 40 reports.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. If the city of Chicago were to file 2 reports a year, it is now delinquent 40 reports?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is correct. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have one further question, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is now within the power of the city of Chicago, is it not, to go to the Supreme Court, to prove that conditions have changed, and under the law that will entitle Chicago to have more water, and Chicago will get relief, if it can prove a case?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio, a distinguished former judge and lawyer, has stated the case with complete correctness. The fact is that the Sanitary District can go to the Supreme Court, and if it can make a case it can get an additional diversion of water. The situation is that simple.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that after Chicago was told by the Supreme Court, "You are unlawfully taking the water which belongs to these States downstream," the city of Chicago tried to persuade President Roosevelt and President Truman to do something about getting the water for them?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding. I think the Senator from Ohio brought out that information. I think that is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, a further question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not also a fact that although Chicago knew it was violating the law and knew that the Supreme Court had told it it was violating the law, the city of Chicago has now come to the U.S. Congress and wants the Congress to validate the taking of water which the Supreme Court says is unlawful?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the Senator from Ohio is making an absolutely devastating case. There are many, many reasons for objecting to this proposal. There is the position of Canada, the position of all the expert agencies— the position of the Public Health Service, of the Department of the Army, of the Bureau of the Budget, and of the State Department. Now, as the Senator from Ohio has argued, even if we did not have all the other objections, the fact is that the Supreme Court has jurisdiction, and the Supreme Court has exercised jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has permitted the additional diversion of water in the past. It could do so again. It is making a study of the situation. If the Supreme Court feels that additional diversion of water is desirable, after the study, it could grant the diversion very easily.

No man in this body will question the integrity and the honesty of the Supreme Court on this kind of an issue. There are not any matters of emotion involved. This is a matter of technical determination, based upon an understanding of the public health factors, of the navigation factors, of the power factors, and that sort of thing. The Supreme Court is perfectly equipped to act on the matter. The Supreme Court has acted in the past and should be permitted to do so again.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question only.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. The fact is that the unemotional way in which the debate is being carried on in the Senate corroborates the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from New Jersey. I think that is correct. Not only is it a fact, as the Senator rightly implies, that there has been some emotion in this debate, but also there have been men of great stature and integrity, and also of enormous influence, who, with every right, have exercised their influence to persuade Senators, as the Senator from Ohio has pointed out, on an ad hominem basis, rather than on the merits of the case. That indicates the great weakness of bringing this matter before the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY rose.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] would appreciate it if I would ask unanimous consent to yield to him to put something in the RECORD, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would appreciate that request. I have an item for the RECORD.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Minnesota for that purpose, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUSPENSION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, earlier today in a colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, I discussed a speech I delivered in the Senate about 10 days ago on the subject of the prohibition of further nuclear tests. That speech has been the subject of discussion and columns, one in particular by the distinguished and eminent writer, Mr. Roscoe Drummond.

The substance and the main point of the speech was to encourage the President of the United States, first, to coordinate American Government policy relating to our attitude on the prohibition of further nuclear tests. I cited, for example, that there were conflicting statements coming from the Atomic Energy Commission and from the Department of Defense which lent themselves to a lack of support of the administration's declared policy of pursuing the effort of obtaining an agreement to prohibit further nuclear tests, provided such agreement had within it a system of safeguarded inspection which would be effective and which could be applied upon all the participating countries and those who were signatories to the treaty.

This position is still the Government's official position. I have noted of late that the President has reaffirmed our desire to pursue an agreement with the Soviet Union and Great Britain to prohibit further nuclear tests.

I was particularly pleased that the second suggestion in my speech—namely, that the President should extend the period of time of suspension of nuclear bomb tests by our Government—was accepted by the President.

President Eisenhower this past week has stated that the U.S. Government will not begin testing again, as had been indicated, following the date of October 31.

My colleagues may remember that about a year ago the President announced that we would impose a ban upon further tests, a self-imposed prohibition upon further testing of nuclear weapons. It was the main argument of my speech in the Senate that while there was still an opportunity or any possibility of reaching an agreement with the Soviet Union on the prevention and prohibition of further nuclear testing, it would be unwise for our Government to engage again in nuclear testing following the October 31 deadline. I felt that the requirements of an effective foreign policy dictated the necessity of a further extension of the moratorium upon nuclear testing. I am particularly pleased that the President of the United States has seen fit to make the announcement which many of us have urged upon him, and has indicated that the Government will continue to press for an agreement for the prohibition of nuclear tests.

Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a column by Mr. Roscoe Drummond, and a copy of a letter I wrote to him regarding this column.

Mr. Drummond's article is entitled "The Test Ban Talks: Danger in HUMPHREY's Speech."

In this article, Mr. Drummond discusses a speech I delivered on the floor of the Senate on August 18, 1959. Many of the points he makes, I regret to say, are in error and need to be corrected.

He also suggests that I have subjected the vital issue of arms control and test ban negotiations to partisan politics. I completely repudiate that charge. It has been my responsibility, as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Disarmament, to work closely with the administration and our Government officials, and I have done just that. I have been privy to most of the official communiques between our Government and the governments of other countries relating to these discussions, starting back in the spring of 1958 and continuing up to date.

I worked closely with the former special assistant on disarmament, Mr. Stassen. I have continued to have a close working relationship with Mr. Farley of the State Department, who is currently the spokesman on this subject matter of disarmament. I shall continue to work in close cooperation with the Secretary of State and others of the administration who have the responsibility for developing disarmament policy.

I do feel, however, that when the Atomic Energy Commisison, the Department of Defense, or any other department, seeks to promote its own particular position which appears in contradiction to the announced official position of the Government of the United States, it is not only right but that it is my duty to point it out.

I support the position which has been taken by the President on this matter of nuclear tests, and I commend him for it, as I did in the speech of August 18 and in speeches that had been delivered prior to that time.

Mr. President, the charge made by Mr. Drummond of partisan politics is not true. This charge saddened me, because I thought it was clear to everyone in the 4 years I have been chairman of the Disarmament Subcommittee I have not treated this matter in a partisan manner. In fact, the reports of our subcommittee have been unanimous, and that surely does not indicate partisanship. There is no room for partisanship on issues of national security.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. One would be unworthy of his duty and of his seat in the U.S. Senate if he treated matters of national security in a partisan spirit.

I yield to my good friend, the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as a member of the Subcommittee on Disarmament I want to say that there has never been a time, with respect to any witness who has appeared, regardless of who he was and to what party he belonged, that the distinguished chairman has not asked him to testify. The hearings have usually been open. The public has been invited. I do not know of any subcommittee I can think of that has been fairer in every respect than the Subcommittee on Disarmament.

All that the distinguished chairman has been trying to do is to get results for the people of the United States of America. I think he made a fine record.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am deeply grateful to the Senator from North Dakota for his very fine statement, one I shall long remember, because it relates to most serious business.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Will the Senator yield for the purpose of bringing up conference reports?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield—Has the Senator from Minnesota completed his remarks?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am about to complete them.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Did not the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me by unanimous consent of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For a specific purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio is inquiring relating to the subject matter of my discussion.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio may ask a question of the Senator from Minnesota, without my losing my right to the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to make a brief statement.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I amend my request so that the Senator from Ohio may make a brief statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I have served with the senior Senator from Minnesota on the Foreign Relations Committee for the last 9 months. I have been with him in the Senate for the last 3 years and 9 months. I merely wish to say that all throughout my contact with him I have felt that he has genuinely and with great intensity attempted to pursue a course of public service that will insure the security of our country and bring the greatest good into international relations.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his very kind and generous statement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Drummond's column and my letter to him of August 27, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 23, 1959]

THE TEST BAN TALKS: DANGER IN HUMPHREY'S SPEECH

(By Roscoe Drummond)

Nothing could be more harmful to the cause of reaching agreement with the Soviet Union on ending nuclear tests than to allow the negotiations to get pushed into the arena of 1960 presidential politics.

I don't mean that Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, is anything other than a sincere and dedicated advocate of finding some way to get an East-West ban on testing. But he is faced with an understandable temptation. If a test ban can be brought about in the next 6 months he can't but feel that it would be a boon to his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination, since he has long been identified with this issue.

The temptation would be for Senator HUMPHREY to dilute his demands for dependable inspection, to deceive himself a little about the Soviet proposals and to heap blame for nonprogress at Geneva upon the Eisenhower administration.

It seems to me that Mr. HUMPHREY has, perhaps unconsciously, yielded somewhat to this temptation in his latest speech on the floor of the Senate.

He charges that it is the President's failure to assert leadership which is jeopardizing the test-ban negotiations at Geneva.

He contends that only one major issue stands in the way of agreement with the Soviets and implies that if we would only put a little push behind it the disagreement could be resolved.

The facts are—and I believe I can demonstrate them to be facts:

That there are three major issues, not just one, blocking agreement at Geneva and that every one of them represents a Soviet effort to build a veto into the functioning of the inspection machinery.

That until the Kremlin shows that it will accept unencumbered inspection of suspicious explosions—which Britain and the United States have accepted—it is pretty farfetched to argue that it is President Eisenhower's lack of interest and lack of leadership which are blocking agreement.

The consequence, however unintended, of Senator HUMPHREY'S stance is to help persuade Premier Khrushchev that if he will just hold out long enough we will in the end accept a watered-down inspection system. I don't think the American Government or the American people will accept a watered-down inspection system and, therefore, the effect of Mr. HUMPHREY'S argument is either to delay agreement or to delay finding out whether the Soviets will accept dependable control.

Here are the three unresolved issues in the negotiations and you can see how each one involves a Soviet effort to put a veto into the inspection machinery:

Suspicious explosions: Moscow wants to limit nonvetoable inspections in each other's territory to a few. We propose freedom to inspect any unexplained explosion. We would be willing to agree to leave the number of nonvetoable yearly inspections to the judgment of the seismological experts on what would be a probable average. Moscow says no.

Staff control posts: Moscow wants the personnel control of post staffs in Russia to be at least 3 to 1 Soviet. We want the staff to have a majority of nonnationals in each other's country on the ground that anything else would provide an automatic veto.

Financial control: On this point Henry S. Hayward, writing from Geneva for the Christian Science Monitor, reports:

"The Soviets have amended their veto over the numbers of points of day-to-day control. But they still claim a veto over all budgetary and financial aspects of control posts, which, in effect, leaves them the power to wreck the entire project."

If the Soviets have any reason to think they can get a diluted and delusive inspection system they'll sit and sit, talk and talk, wait and wait. The only way to speed up the acceptable agreement is to show that we will not abandon nuclear testing unless possibly illegal testing can be freely inspected.

AUGUST 27, 1959.

Mr. ROSCOE DRUMMOND,
New York Herald Tribune,
National Press Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR ROSCOE: I was disturbed, and frankly, saddened, to read your column appearing in the Washington Post of August 23, 1959. Apparently, there has been a failure of communications somewhere, and I shall try to make my position clear to you, as well as to call your attention to the record of the discussions on this whole question of nuclear testing.

First of all, my address was one of a continuing series on the disarmament problem, a series in which I have repeatedly emphasized the absolute necessity of coming to agreements on arms control only when we have an effective control and inspection system. Indeed, I have been in the forefront of those who have tried to urge an improvement in our inspection system, as proposed in the Berkner report.

Surely you must be aware that I have not subjected this vital matter to partisan politics. Indeed, I have supported the executive branch when I believed it to be right. An examination of the 14 statements which I have made in Congress on the subject of arms control this year, will reveal that 10 were in support of the administration or offering suggestions, while 4 were critical.

Again, I must emphasize that I have stressed consistently and forcefully the need for adequate controls. Frankly, Roscoe, I feel that you have done me a serious disservice, and a disservice to the terribly important effort to find a coherent and logical way out of this staggering arms race, to suggest that I have been partisan in my approach to this subject.

I think, perhaps, that I failed in the address in question to get across to you this major point: I was urging the President not to let the matter of coming to a decision on the resumption of nuclear testing continue to drift, not to permit the Atomic Energy Commission and the Pentagon to go their way in defiance of the President's policy, through their practice of leaking stories to the press. The AEC and the Pentagon, I strongly submit, were undermining the President's position in this matter, and the position advocated by the Department of State.

It is noteworthy that President Eisenhower last night did announce the further suspension of nuclear testing until the end of the year—as I have previously called on him to do. This gives us further time to try to work out the remaining problems at the Geneva Conference. I strongly support the President's decision, and I said so publicly last night. It is gratifying to be able to commend him—as you may recall I commended him for his part in the Geneva negotiations.

Now, in detail, may I respectfully point out that in my address of August 18, which was fully printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I underlined not one, not two, but six unresolved issues, and alluded to a seventh. I not only listed them; I discussed them in detail and told the positions of the two sides where positions existed. I did say of the unresolved issues, one was a major stumbling block and that on this the executive branch was divided, and hence no negotiating position had been reached. Any knowledgeable person in the executive branch would agree with me. The President has referred to it in press conferences. The Vice President mentioned it on his trip to the Soviet Union. In my speech I acknowledged that even if the administration had a negotiating position on the on-site inspection problem, an agreement would not follow if the Soviets refused to agree to a reasonable number of inspections.

Because I wish to write to each of the newspapers who publish your column, in an effort to set the record straight, I would very much appreciate your furnishing me at your earliest convenience a list of these newspapers.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask unanimous consent that an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post this morning entitled "Footing for the World Court," which again endorses the resolution I introduced calling for the repeal of the so-called Connally amendment, which limits the jurisdiction of the World Court, be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOOTING FOR THE WORLD COURT

Attorney General Rogers has made an effective plea for resuscitation of the World Court. His speech to the General Assembly of the American Bar Association at Miami Beach pointed out that the United States was "the first Nation to provide that the jurisdiction of the Court should be determined not by the Court but by us"—in other words, to undercut it. Following the lead of this country, seven other nations made similar reservations, and the rule of reciprocity allows every country with which the United States has a dispute to decline to accept the jurisdiction of the Court.

Suppose that our domestic courts could decide only those cases in which both parties were willing to accept their jurisdiction. The effect on the judicial system would be disastrous. Instead of genuine courts, we should have only arbitration tribunals functioning in such cases as might be submitted to them voluntarily by all the parties concerned. That would leave us not far removed from the law of the jungle.

No one should have any illusions about the establishment of a universal rule of law while the world is divided between freedom and communism. But at least the United States should be moving toward wider application of law to disputes within the free world, and it can scarcely do this while continuing to cripple the World Court. It is highly desirable that the Attorney General has spoken out clearly on this subject, as have Vice President NIXON, Senator HUMPHREY and many others. Much more will be required, however, before the Senate can be induced to correct its ill-advised reservation to the International Court of Justice convention. We still hope that President Eisenhower will find time to stir the conscience of the Senate on this matter so vitally related to his campaign for peace and justice.

ADDITIONAL TIME WITHIN WHICH CERTAIN STATE AGREEMENTS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY ACT MAY BE MODIFIED—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 213) to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 219 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 213) to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 218 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the text of the bill and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill and agree to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the report was considered and agreed to.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING CERTAIN CLAIMS FOR CREDIT OR REFUND OF OVERPAYMENTS OF INCOME TAXES — CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2906) to extend the period for filing claims for credit or refund of overpayments of income taxes arising as a result of renegotiation of Government contracts. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the report was considered and agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from California without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. To make a brief comment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. To make a brief comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on behalf of the people and the government of California, I thank the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia and his fellow Senate conferees for insisting on our Senate amendments and prevailing in the conference on the social security legislation. There is thus provided in the bill benefits to certain public employees in the State of California which now run to a number of other States. The House regrettably saw fit to object to our Senate amendment placing California in the social security bill alongside those other States which authorize local policemen and firemen to enjoy the benefits of social security.

The fact is that the Legislature of California passed legislation a short time ago, which the Governor signed, under which policemen and firemen in the several communities of California would be able to enjoy the benefits of social security protection without being penalized at all for any benefits they might have under retirement systems of their own. This State law was, of course, subject to appropriate Federal legislation.

In a very persuasive letter to the California congressional delegation the Governor of California requested that the Federal social security laws be amended so that policemen and firemen in the cities and towns in the State from which I come might take advantage of the provisions of this beneficent statute in the same fashion as policemen and firemen in other States of the Union. I offered the appropriate amendment in the Senate. It was approved. The House objected, but now has agreed. This would not be possible were it not for the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and his Senate conferees, who prevailed in the conference.

I repeat my thanks to him for one more public service well done.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. I thank the Senator from California.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills of the Senate:

S. 539. An act for the relief of Mrs. Joyce Freeman;

S. 669. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to convey certain lands to the Bethel Baptist Church of Henderson, Tenn.;

S. 696. An act for the relief of Mrs. Annie Voisin Whitley;

S. 1071. An act for the relief of Nettie Korn and Manfred Korn;

S. 1298. An act for the relief of Concetta Meglio Meglio;

S. 1392. An act for the relief of Isabel M. Menz;

S. 1557. An act for the relief of Allen Howard Pilgrim, Cheryl Ann Pilgrim, Robb Alexander Pilgrim, and Jocelyn Marie Pilgrim;

S. 1650. An act for the relief of Edmund A. Hannay;

S. 2081. An act for the relief of Yadwiga Boczar;

S. 2102. An act for the relief of Irene Wladyslawa Burda; and

S. 2238. An act for the relief of Kenzo Hachtmann, a minor.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, to continue with the excellent argument of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], which unfortunately was placed in the RECORD this morning without being read or without being discussed, the Senator from Illinois did this, as I have said before, because, in his judgment, delay would work against the bill; and I agree that the more we talk about the bill and the more we consider its merits and discuss it, the more the likelihood is that the bill will be defeated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield before he goes into that subject?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in the year 1950, specifically in October, the Supreme Court denied a petition of Illinois for a clarification of the decree of April 21, 1930, because, as the Court said:

> The decree is clear and unambiguous, and requires no clarification?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is correct. My understanding is that in 1950 Illinois and the sanitary district petitioned the Supreme Court for an interpretation and clarification of the decree of April 21, 1930. The need for such an interpretation and clarification was allegedly based on an increase in the population in the sanitary district and on an extension of the territorial limits of the district.

I may say at this point that this is exactly the argument which the Senators from Illinois have been making. They say that because Chicago now has a bigger population, it should be permitted to divert additional waters.

The complainant States moved to dismiss the petition on the ground that the decree was unambiguous and that the change in conditions since its entry gave no cause for clarification or interpretation because the increases in population and size were taken into consideration in the formulation of the decree. The Supreme Court granted the motion to dismiss on October 23, 1950. This, in effect, is what the Senator from Ohio has been saying.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that the decree which the State of Illinois asked to be amended was rendered on April 20, 1930, and that in that decree the Court declared what were the just rights of Chicago, namely, the use of so much water as was needed for domestic purposes, and an additional 1,500 cubic feet a second in their drainage canal?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct, and that is an excellent clarification. That is right.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in that decision which was rendered in 1930, the Court said, in effect, "These are your rights, and you will have to comply with these rights"?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The case is absolutely clear. The decision of the Supreme Court in 1950 was that that was the situation, exactly as the Senator from Ohio has just expressed it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in that decision the Supreme Court, to make certain that Chicago would comply with the order, required Chicago to file reports?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But is it not a fact that the city of Chicago failed to file those reports?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct. I should like to make it clear that this was the requirement, because there is no question that the city of Chicago has not filed a report since 1939. I make it emphatically clear that this was a part of the decree.

I read from the State of Illinois, sanitary district, et al., defendants, dated April 21, 1930, paragraph 5, as follows:

> That the defendant Sanitary District of Chicago shall file with the Clerk of this Court semiannually on July 1 and January 1 of each year, beginning July 1, 1930, a report to this court adequately setting forth the progress made in the construction of the sewage treatment plants and appurtenances outlined in the program as proposed by the Sanitary District of Chicago, and also setting forth the extent and effects of the operation of the sewage treatment plants, respectively, that shall have been placed in operation, and also the average diversion of water from Lake Michigan during the period from the entry of this decree down to the date of such report.

These reports have not been filed since 1939. Chicago has been delinquent for 20 full years.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I am very much interested——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York for a statement.

Mr. McCARTHY. I object.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Does the Senator from Wisconsin feel that the impression made by the arguments, which I know, with modesty he would not regard as entirely his own, but the arguments made by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Michigan and others, in connection with the bill, are having an effect upon Senators to the extent that some Senators might well reconsider their position if a motion were again made to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations for further consideration?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I earnestly hope so. That would be my understanding. I think the Senator from New York made a tremendously important point yesterday, one which I think was of great service to the Senate, with respect to what appeared to be a strange vote, a vote not to table a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That is, they voted against tabling; and then the Senate turned around and voted against referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The junior Senator from New York brought out by his question that the only conclusion to be reached is that Senators wanted more argument. We have tried to present them with additional argument. We have pleaded with the proponents to make their arguments. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has placed a statement in the RECORD. We have been making a reply point by point. I think every fair-minded person will agree that we have answered it clearly. I expect to place in the RECORD a statement which will meet their argument further.

The argument that House bill 1 should be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee is overwhelming. We are trying to make that point. If we are given a little time in which to make it, I believe other Senators will see our point of view.

Mr. KEATING. But does not the Senator from Wisconsin believe, from his contacts with other Members of the Senate at times when he is not addressing the Senate, that there is a growing feeling among them—even among those on the side of the aisle on which I sit, who are very anxious to have the sewage in Chicago properly disposed of, because Chicago is the site of the next national convention——

Mr. PROXMIRE. I assure the Senator from New York that the Democrats are just as anxious to have sewage disposed of as are the Republicans——

Mr. KEATING. I am sure of that.

Does not the Senator from Wisconsin believe that, apart from the desire of both Republicans and Democrats—either for political or for other purposes—to have the sewage in Chicago properly disposed of, there is, in addition, a growing feeling that the international ramifications of this problem, in terms of our relations with our good neighbor to the north, are more and more important in their own minds—and in their thinking in regard to this matter?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from New York is correct. I am very much encouraged by the conferences I have had with other Senators. I think there is such a growing recognition. It has been stated by a number of Senators who in the past have favored the bill. They have said they now believe that, under the circumstances, the bill should certainly be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, because Canada is a good friend of ours, and certainly deserves at least that much consideration.

Mr. KEATING. Without in any way impugning the motives of any Senator, does not the Senator from Wisconsin find it unusual that the proponents of this measure, who normally are in the forefront in the fight in favor of the good neighbor policy with our neighbors, both those to the north and those to the south, would push for the passage of a measure which certainly has the appearance of setting back our good relations with our neighbors in the immediate future?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes, it is most surprising; and I believe that adequate consideration of that point might be very persuasive to many Senators.

On yesterday, I was very much interested to observe that the Senator from Alabama, whom I regard as being as well informed as any Member of this body—stated that he did not know a majority of the members of the Public Works Committee wanted to have the bill referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. Obviously, the Foreign Relations Committee takes the same position.

If those facts—particularly the effect on our good-neighbor policy, as well as the other facts I have stated—are called to the attention of all Senators, it seems to me that then the Senate might well vote by a substantial vote to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, where the bill belongs.

Mr. KEATING. Then does not the Senator from Wisconsin think that perhaps some time later today or some time tomorrow or at some other time in the course of the further debate on the bill, a motion might be made to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, with instructions to report it to the Senate at a date different from the one called for by the previous motion? In that event, does not the Senator from Wisconsin think such a motion probably would be agreed to?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think it undoubtedly would be agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me say to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that we realize the great interest he has in this matter; and I submit to him that the proper way to handle this measure is to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, with instructions to report it to the Senate by a certain date. In that way, the bill could not possibly be killed.

Mr. KEATING. Is the Senator from Wisconsin aware of the fact that in the encomiums which I have showered upon the proponents of this measure who favor the maintenance of good relations with our neighbors to the north and to the south, I specifically had in mind the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN]?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes; I am very much aware of that fact. I am also aware, and I am also sure, that one little word—the word "yes"—if uttered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] would at once end this debate; and then the bill would immediately be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, and equity would be done. All of us know that the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], has that power right in the palm of his hand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, for a question.

Mr. DIRKSEN. With the utmost of respect——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for a statement by the Senator from Illinois, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, with the utmost of respect for my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, I must disclaim any such influence either in this body or in the Dominion of Canada.

Besides, I must remind my distinguished friend that the Senate formally passed on the question of referring this measure to the Foreign Relations Committee. So, if an alternative date were to be proposed, it still would not go to the substance of the motion on which the Senate formally acted by manifesting its will.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me say to my good friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that the whole difficulty is that that decision was made without debate. The Senate rejected the motion to lay on the table the motion to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee; and then the Senate immediately voted—as the Senator from New York has pointed out—on the motion to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee; there was no debate on that motion. Under those circumstances, it was perfectly clear—inasmuch as the Senate decided that it did not wish to lay on the table the motion to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, and next voted that it did not then want the bill to be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee—that what the Senate wants to have is a full discussion and debate in regard to the international-relations aspects of this measure.

We are now engaging in a debate on the international-relations aspects. It is obvious that the Senate wishes to have the merits of that matter considered fully. Let me point out that of course Senators are very busy, and most of them have not heretofore had that opportunity. But after they do, then undoubtedly the Senate will vote—and I point out that it would take a change of mind on the part of only 3 of the 100 Senators to bring about that result—to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield again to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, even with my unbounded respect for the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin—although at times I differ with him—I wish to state that certainly in this case the Senate should follow the instruction which was written on ancient parchment:

> But let your communication be yea, yea; nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.

So I think there will be less calculated confusion in the Chamber if we act by means of the simple motions which often are made here, rather than to have lengthy debate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Illinois will agree that in no other body on the face of the earth is the opportunity to engage in debate more revered or respected than it is in the Senate of the United States.

I believe that the Senator from Illinois also would have to reach the conclusion—although perhaps he differs with me—that the vote taken on yesterday indicated the desire of a majority of the Members of the Senate to have this matter explored further. Otherwise, how could one explain the fact that after the Senate voted not to lay on the table the motion to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senate then voted against the motion to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I learned long ago that no souls are saved after the first 20 minutes of discussion.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the various interjections in our remarks appear either before or after the discussion of H.R. 1. Otherwise, I fear the discussion of H.R. 1 is going to be so interrupted and broken up that it will be hard for those reading the discussion to learn what developed in the Senate. So I ask unanimous consent that at the various times, times we have yielded for extraneous matters, those remarks come either at the beginning or the end of the discussion on H.R. 1.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I assume that the Senator refers to remarks which are in no way relevant to the bill, and that the request does not include the remarks of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator for that suggestion. The Senator from Illinois was discussing H.R. 1. My request related to the conference reports, the statement of the Senator from Minnesota, and other matters not relevant to H.R. 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In answering the question about the Supreme Court and its relationship to diversion, the Senator from Illinois concluded by saying:

> Further, the Court, were it to increase diversion, would undoubtedly do so on a permanent basis. The passage of H.R. 1 would undoubtedly assist the master, through the proposed report, in arriving at valid conclusions.

Both of those sentences are wrong, flatly wrong. On the record they can both be shown to be wrong. First, it states that the Court, were it to increase diversion, would undoubtedly do so on a permanent basis. The fact is that the Court has increased diversion on a temporary basis. There is no reason why the Court will not do it again now on a temporary basis. It did so in 1956. We have read into the RECORD the Court decree doing that. The Court could do it again. It could provide for temporary diversion for the purposes of test if it decided there was merit in it.

The next passage of the statement of the Senator from Illinois reads, as follows:

> The passage of H.R. 1 would undoubtedly assist the master, through the proposed report, in arriving at valid conclusions.

The fact is that the Supreme Court has asserted, as emphatically as it could, that it has jurisdiction in this situation and that the Congress, in its judgment, does not have jurisdiction. We brought that fact out in the RECORD. I do not know how anybody can question that view.

There is no question in my mind that the Supreme Court would regard it as interference and as usurpation of its power if the Congress passed a law that a study of this matter be engaged in, when the Supreme Court has gone to the trouble of appointing a distinguished judge, who is the senior judge of a U.S. circuit court, to conduct a complete and thorough investigation of this whole situation. What is being proposed is a duplication of this investigtion, at a waste of $1 million.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that when the Supreme Court in 1930 declared Chicago was taking water out of the Great Lakes basin and transferring it into the Mississippi Valley, it did so on the basis that Chicago had no right to take water out of the Great Lakes if the taking had an adverse impact upon navigation?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that this Congress cannot at all assist the Supreme Court by, in a bill, providing for the taking of water out of the Great Lakes basin and giving it to Chicago; and is it not a fact that the only way the Supreme Court will be able to determine the facts is by expert testimony, such as the Corps of Army Engineers or other engineers who would testify to the facts?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct on both points. The junior Senator from Alabama made the point yesterday that such legislation might be unconstitutional inasmuch as it might violate a treaty which the United States has signed. The more I study this matter, the more I am convinced it would be unconstitutional on that ground. It seems to me that the body to decide constitutional questions is the Supreme Court.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that when the Supreme Court says that 3,300 feet is the maximum that will be allowed to be taken——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me say at that point it is my understanding it is 1,500 feet plus domestic consumption, whatever that may be, 1,800 feet or 2,000 feet; but it is 1,500 plus domestic consumption.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My question is, Is it not a fact that the Supreme Court said that there can be taken out 1,500 feet for the canals and whatever is needed for domestic purposes in homes?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And is it not a fact that that total quantity amounts to about 3,300 cubic feet per second?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Between 3,100 and 3,300 feet, is my understanding.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that 3,300 cubic feet per second amounts to about 2,200 million gallons a day?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding. That is a fantastic amount. The figure is so enormous that it can hardly be imagined.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that when 3,300 cubic feet per second of water is used, the mind cannot grasp the true impact of the quantity of water, by way of number of gallons, that has been taken?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct. What is more, I am going shortly to put into the RECORD information showing that Chicago is by far the most extravagant user of water for domestic purposes in the country; that it fails to meter its water, and because of that fact there is extravagant use of water. This is another reason why industry locates in Chicago rather than in Cleveland or Milwaukee. Milwaukee meters about 100 percent of its water. Industry is more desirous of locating in a place where it does not have to worry about metering or payment for water. If water is not metered, industry has an advantage. It is an advantage to industry in Chicago, but at the expense of other Great Lakes cities like Cleveland or Milwaukee.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that if the 1,000 additional feet of water is taken out of the lake, the quantity of water taken out will increase from 2,200 million gallons a day to 3 billion gallons a day?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it a fact that yesterday the Senator from Wisconsin had a dialog with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] on the constitutional question involved in this proceeding?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is true, and I thought that colloquy was, from my standpoint, the most enlightening colloquy we have had on this whole issue, because the Senator from Alabama brought out so emphatically, in the first place, that the Senate wanted more debate on this matter and more understanding and consideration of it; and, secondly, the fact that the interests of Canada were legitimately concerned. In his judgment it seemed that the treaties with Canada might well be violated and that, for that reason, the only body in the Senate that has competence and jurisdiction to pass on the violation of those treaties should be called upon by the Senate for its advice, and that therefore the bill should go to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not also a fact that in this subject of involvement with Canada, that country, in its note to our State Department, pointed out four treaties and conventions which it believes would be violated if the Congress authorized the increased diversion of water?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In the memorandum No. 184——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is the Senator asking a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

In the memorandum No. 184, did not the Canadian Ambassador say:

> The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago and directs attention to provisions of two treaties in particular—

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is absolutely correct. I hold in my hand the note from the Canadian Ambassador, A. D. P. Heeney, dated April 9, 1959, to the Acting Secretary of State at that time, the Hon. Christian A. Herter. Those are the exact words of the note of the Ambassador.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that in specifying the treaties which would be violated in particular, Mr. Heeney said:

> (a) The Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909: The applicability of either article II, paragraph 2, or article III of this treaty depends upon the interpretation of physical facts.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And did not the Ambassador, Mr. Heeney, further say in that letter:

> If Lake Michigan physically flows into the boundary water Lake Huron, article II preserves to Canada the right to object to such a diversion which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests in Canadian waters.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And is it not also a fact that in the same letter Mr. Heeney said:

> If, as has been asserted by eminent U.S. jurists——

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio at that point?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should like to invite the particular attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] to this colloquy, because he raised this specific point in a question which I was not able to completely answer yesterday. The answer is in the note written by the Canadian Ambassador. I think this is the proper answer at this point, as well as the answer to be found a little later in the same note, as shown on page 20 of the committee report.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that Mr. Heeney said:

If, as has been asserted by eminent U.S. jurists, article III of the treaty applies, no further diversion shall be made except with the approval of the International Joint Commission.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a fact that Mr. Heeney then went on to the other treaty; that is, the Niagara Treaty of 1950; and is it not a fact that he said:

(b) Niagara Treaty of 1950: This treaty allocates water for scenic and power purposes. The amount of water which shall be available for these purposes is the total outflow from Lake Erie. The specific inclusion of certain added waters in article III of the treaty emphasizes the underlying assumption that existing supplies will continue unabated.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is correct.

I should like to return once again, Mr. President, because it must be emphasized, to the fact that Canada says no further diversion shall be made except with the approval of the International Joint Commission. How can Canada be any more emphatic than that?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Has the administration taken a clear position in support of or in opposition to the bill?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The administration has taken a clear position in opposition to the bill, as evidenced by a letter from the Bureau of the Budget, which recommends against enactment of the bill. That is shown in the majority report, on page 16, at the end of the second paragraph, in which it is stated:

In the face of these protests from Canada and in view of the pending application by certain Great Lakes States before the Supreme Court for a review of the decree of April 21, 1930, the Bureau of the Budget must recommend against the enactment of S. 308.

As the Senator from Minnesota knows, S. 308 is the sister bill, an identical bill to H.R. 1.

Mr. McCARTHY. Have officials of the State Department spoken out in any way, other than to transmit the views of the Canadian government?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes. The State Department has spoken out. That letter is shown on pages 16 and 17 of the committee report.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the letter from William B. Macomber, Jr.?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is a letter from William B. Macomber, Jr., Assistant Secretary, and there is a further statement on pages 18 and 19 of the report, by Woodbury W. Willoughby. The second statement is the more emphatic one.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can the Senator tell me whether there has been a statement on the part of the administration spokesmen to the effect that the President would veto the bill if passed by Congress?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is no such statement to my knowledge. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, it seems to me it has been the policy of President Eisenhower, as well as the policy of most other Presidents, not to indicate, on pending legislation, whether he would veto it or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think the Senator should say that it has been the policy of the President not to indicate his view.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I will say the indications have been subtle, and subject to various interpretations, and so forth.

I will answer the question of the Senator from Minnesota by saying I think there has been no such indication.

Mr. McCARTHY. The subtlety was not of the same nature as the subtlety involved in the indications as to what the President was going to do, let us say, with regard to two or three farm bills which he vetoed or the housing bill which he vetoed?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The subtlety was perhaps a little less subtle.

Mr. McCARTHY. There was more subtlety in those cases?

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the case of the housing bill the indication was much more subtle, perhaps, than in this case, although I have answered the Senator from Minnesota by saying I think there was no such indication.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. If the Senator will defer for a minute, in answer to the question of the junior Senator from Minnesota I should like to say it is my understanding that on page 17 of the committee report the State Department made a statement. I do not know how the State Department could be more emphatic. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, the State Department said:

The Department believes that enactment of S. 308 would have unfortunate repercussions on our relations with a friendly foreign government and it is therefore unable to support this legislation.

While that statement does not recommend against the enactment of the bill, it would seem to me, since the Department says it cannot support the bill, and since it says passage of the bill would have unfortunate repercussions on our relations with a friendly foreign government, that the only construction I can put on the statement is that the State Department is saying, "Do no pass the bill."

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Congress were to act favorably, then there is a very good possibility that the bill would be vetoed by the President; and, if that did not happen, there is a chance that the action might be overruled by the court?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Of course, I would hope, in the event the bill passes the President would veto it. In the event the President fails to veto the bill, if it passes, I would hope the courts would act against it. It seems to me both of these factors would tend to make most thoughtful Senators vote against the bill.

Regardless of whether we agree or disagree with President Eisenhower on most issues, I think this is a nonpartisan issue, and all of us have respect for the President's judgment on matters pertaining to international affairs, particularly. If there is any indication that the President might veto the bill, and if there is any indication that the court might hold it invalid, it seems to me these are fairly compelling arguments that the Congress should look at the bill more carefully. It is perhaps even a more compelling argument that we should send the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to have their expert advice on it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a further question.

Mr. McCARTHY. So far as the exercise of a veto is concerned, is it the Senator's opinion that, if there is an area in which the Congress should risk a veto, and in which the President ought to feel somewhat more free to use the veto, it should be that area which has to do with international relations and affairs, rather than that which has to do with legislation of a particularly domestic character?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think that might well be true.

Mr. McCARTHY. This is a general distinction.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think there might well be such a distinction, in view of the fact that the President has a peculiar and unusual degree of authority and information—and has to have a peculiar and unusual degree of authority and information—with regard to our foreign relations and the actions of other governments.

Mr. McCARTHY. So is it really somewhat more defensible for Congress to risk a Presidential veto, or to take action which might be subjected to veto in the complicated field of international affairs, than it might be in the case of domestic legislation?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is perfectly possible, but it is my position, and it has been my consistent position in regard to economic affairs, as well as other affairs, at least as a Democrat, that while I respect the President, and while I pay great attention to his recommendations, I try to decide questions clearly on their merits. If there is an indication that the President will veto legislation, I try to find out why. If I think he is right in considering a veto, then I might be somewhat persuaded by the argument he makes. If I think he is wrong, I may ignore it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the Senator be somewhat more willing to have us vote on this bill and pass it if the Senate should vote to override the President on the housing bill, since if that were done, this could be sent to him and he could then build up his batting average?

Mr. PROXMIRE. To be frank with my good friend from Minnesota, I do not see very much of a connection between the two. I think the President's batting average on some legislation, unfortunately, perhaps, from my standpoint, has been 1,000 percent. However, I cannot imagine any thoughtful Senator, any responsible Senator, voting to pass a measure under the assumption that the President might veto it, however firmly he felt that was the situation, because he thinks so voting is an escape hatch from responsibility.

On the contrary, I think that about the only effect the feeling that the President might veto legislation, could have on a fair-minded Senator would be to make him reflect, "Well, I had better take a look at this. The President is the man who has the best sources of information in our Government, and if the President feels adverse to this proposal, it should get greater scrutiny than it has had in the past."

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not quite agree that he is the best informed official in the Government.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I did not say that the President was the best informed official of the Government. I said he had the best sources of information of anyone in the Government, and I think that on some issues he may well be the best informed, although I am sure the Senator from Minnesota would agree that there are some issues on which he has not been well informed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Of course, the other consideration is that however much information might be available, an individual has to absorb it and make application of it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is true, and if the Senator from Minnesota, for whom I have great affection and great admiration, were to find that the Budget Bureau was saying "don't sign," the State Department was saying "it is going to have an adverse effect on relations with a foreign power," if the Department of the Army, which is one of the two agencies responsible for making the proposed study, says "we do not need this legislation to make a study," and if the Public Health Service, which is the other agency to make the study, says "we can make this study without the additional diversion," I think the Senator from Minnesota would be constrained to say that he, from the information he had, would be apt to say "don't sign the bill" or "don't vote for the bill."

Mr. McCARTHY. In this case there are really two points. One is as to the amount of information.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is asking a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARTHY. I want to ask a question. I ask that the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCARTHY. In this particular case, is it not true that we go into a field of foreign policy and international relations in which the President has a special responsibility, and that therefore for Congress to risk a veto is not wholly irresponsible? This is not in the nature of a challenge, but rather we say "here is an area of confusion, an area of some conflict. So we act and we send it on to you, and if you in your good judgment, in fulfilling the duties of your office, feel the bill should be vetoed, well and good."

As the Senator I think knows, I have voted to override every veto I have had a chance to vote on in this session of Congress, but I feel that if this bill were vetoed, the President should be sustained, because in this case it is my opinion that he is exercising the veto in the area in which he has more or less a superior right to exercise it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should say to my good friend from Minnesota that everything he has said suggests to me that we should pay the closest attention to any expression that comes from an office close to the President of the United States. The State Department has spoken out in unmistakeable terms. They say the enactment of the bill would have an unfortunate effect on our relations with a friendly foreign power. The Budget Bureau has spoken out and has recommended very emphatically against enactment of the bill.

In view of those statements coming from sources close to the President in an area in which the Senator from Minnesota says he is peculiarly expert, and in which he is peculiarly qualified——

Mr. McCARTHY. Not expert.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Well, peculiarly qualified.

Mr. McCARTHY. Peculiarly responsible.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think he should give great weight to the testimony of the Federal agencies and to the testimony that is so overwhelming and so emphatic, so clearcut, it would seem to me, that these considerations should lead most prudent Senators to vote against the bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. I assure the Senator from Wisconsin that I want him to understand that I am really trying to make it easier for him to let this measure come to a vote because of the many assurances he has that if it is passed, it will be vetoed; and I would even go so far——

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I say to the Senator from Minnesota that there is absolutely no assurance, no assurance whatever, that the President will veto it. We can come to the conclusion, perhaps based on the evidence that we have, that he might veto it, but I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is the President's spokesman in this body. He is the man who perhaps has more influence with the President than any other Senator. He has sacrificed many things for the President. He wants this bill passed very much. He represents Chicago. If the Senator from Illinois should plead with the President of the United States for the bill, I think his plea would have very great influence.

This concerns me very deeply. This is a particular reason why, it seems to me, it is incumbent upon those of us who oppose the bill to urge our fellows in the Senate not to count on a Presidential veto, because a man with very great power and influence on a matter of this kind feels very strongly that the President should sign the bill, and he would undoubtedly use all of the great influence he has to persuade the President to sign the bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is the Senator suggesting that after all these protestations on the part of various members of the administration, the President might sign the bill simply to show public support for the minority leader of the Senate?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am saying to the Senator from Minnesota that I have great faith in the integrity and the honor of the President of the United States. I agree that he will act on the basis of his best judgment, but I am saying that he is a fantastically busy man. He is concerned with many, many things. He has enormously important problems to discuss with the Premier of Russia and with many, many other people. He has tremendously complicated economic problems before him, and frankly, I cannot see the President of the United States sitting down and spending an hour or a half an hour or even 15 minutes studying this legislation with great care. While it is a matter of importance to us—is very important to us—if the junior Senator from Illinois, the minority leader, comes to the President, and makes a fervent plea, I think it is possible that the President of the United States might not have the opportunity, because he is a terribly busy man, to get the information that would persuade him not to sign it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will not be reassured on this matter. I could only add, if this is of any help to him, that if the President should veto the bill, I would vote to sustain the veto.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Minnesota, and I very much appreciate his concluding observations.

Mr. McCARTHY. It should be reassuring.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am doubly reassured.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not a tribute to the candidate of the junior Senator of Minnesota for the Presidency of the United States, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], that last night when he voted to send the pending bill to the Foreign Relations Committee he indicated a purpose to abide by treaties and by solemn compacts made with foreign countries? Is that not a tribute to the candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Senator will yield for a question, I should like to ask either the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Wisconsin whether they do not think that this is an indication that the senior Senator from Minnesota is anticipating the office of the Presidency, and is already beginning to take to himself special responsibilities?

Mr. PROXMIRE. May I say to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Minnesota that it is a great tribute to the senior Senator from Minnesota that he recognized that. The senior Senator from Minnesota is eminently qualified for the Presidency. He is a candidate I should be delighted to support. He would make a great President of the United States.

Mr. McCARTHY. As I recall, the senior Senator from Minnesota in times past has voted for water diversion.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me say to my good friend from Minnesota that in all fairness to his senior colleague, the fact is that this bill is entirely different. Circumstances are different. In 1958 Canada did not protest. The State Department stated that it had no objection. It appeared at that time that there would be no question of offending a foreign power.

In 1959, on the other hand, it is clear that Canada has objected. It could hardly be more emphatic. The language which the Senator from Ohio has so emphasized shows that Canada would consider the proposed action a grievous kind of insult, involving the breaking of treaties.

Mr. McCARTHY. Were not the same treaties in effect in 1958 as are in effect now?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Indeed they were; but in 1958 the situation was different, because our good friends in Canada apparently did not believe at that time that the proposed diversion would be a violation of a treaty. What we think treaties provide is very important; but it is even more important what our friends in Canada think they provide. We cannot decide this question strictly on the basis of our own interpretation of the treaties. If a good friend says, "You are violating a solemn agreement," the very least one can do is to consult with the experts and ask them the question, "Am I?"

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems that the Canadian position changes—I will not say from day to day, but at least there have been some variations in it. In view of that fact, might it not be well for us to pass the bill and let the man who holds the office of President, decide, with his advisers, whether it should be approved or whether it should be vetoed? There is such a thing as the grace of office, which we must recognize.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Let me say to my good friend from Minnesota that the fact that Canada changes its mind indicates that it has had an opportunity to study the problem and has become concerned over it. Canada finds out that the principle is extremely important, and that the consequences of the proposed diversion would be severe and serious. It seems to me that is perfectly understandable, perfectly human. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota would be among the first to recognize that all governments are human institutions, composed of fallible human beings. Perhaps in this case Canada is wrong. Perhaps in the other case she was right. The fact is that at the present time Canada believes that we would be violating a treaty if we were to enact the proposed legislation. We should at least honor the protest of Canada by asking our own foreign policy experts in the Senate for their advice with respect to the treaty.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator for his courtesy in yielding.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILEY. Is it not a fact that Senators, independent of the President or anyone else, owe a responsibility to ascertain what the truth is and to vote their convictions, and not be under the thumb of any individual or any group? Is not that our responsibility?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my senior colleague from Wisconsin. I think he states the situation very well. There is no question that we should make up our minds on the basis of the merits of an issue. Members of Congress, particularly Democrats, have said a great deal in criticism of the administration. I am one of those who have criticized "government by veto." If that criticism has any validity or makes any sense whatever, it means that we insist that Congress has a responsibility not to count on a veto, not to enact legislation merely because it is said the President will veto it, but to make up our minds on the merits, as to the effect of the proposed legislation, and then decide.

I thank my colleague very much for his question.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILEY. That is our personal responsibility. If we cannot "pass the buck," if it is up to us, under our oaths, to make a decision, does the Senator see any justification for asking the question, "What is the President going to do?"

Mr. PROXMIRE. I see no justification. I think the implications of the question of the Senator from Wisconsin are very clear. The answer is that, as responsible Senators, it is up to us to make up our own minds, and not to "pass the buck" merely because there are fine men, whom we like very much, for whom we have a deep affection, who want to see the bill passed. We should not vote to pass the bill on the assumption that the President will take care of it by vetoing it. I believe that that sort of attitude is very destructive, and if it is applied to legislation, the results can be extremely bad. Such an attitude can result in extremely bad legislation and a terrible burden on the President. He has many decisions to make. While this is an important piece of legislation to us, the President has hundreds of bills to sign, and has a vast responsibility in foreign affairs. He cannot spend many hours familiarizing himself with the issues involved in connection with the proposed legislation.

We know that the party of my good friend the minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], the leader of the Republican Party in the Senate, will urge the President to sign the bill. I think we should be very careful about passing that kind of legislation. We know that the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois has great influence with the President of the United States. If we are to be sure that our sacred word is protected in this case, we have very little alternative but to defeat the bill, or to send it to the Committee on Foreign Relations for advice.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Is not the fear of the distinguished Senator grounded also on the fact that our distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], is apparently also in favor of this measure? So there is a very powerful combination in favor of the measure.

Also, our distinguished friend from Texas might talk with the President. This powerful combination presents us with a really serious situation, which makes it imperative that we should not act quickly and leave it to the President to take care of the situation when the bill reaches him.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator. I believe the Senator from New York recognizes the great influence, power, ability, and character of our fine majority leader. He has very great influence. I am sure he has great influence with the President of the United States. As the Senator from New York has indicated in his question, the minority leader, the present spokesman of his party in this body, tells the President to sign House bill 1. The distinguished majority leader, being in the same position, could very well urge the same course. Under such circumstances House bill 1 might pass, notwithstanding the conviction on the part of many of us that it should not be passed, that it would be a very grave error, that it would insult Canada, that it would usurp the power of the Supreme Court, and violate the recommendations of every executive agency which has been asked to pass upon it. Notwithstanding all that, House bill 1 might still become law. So it is particularly vital that Senators consider the proposed legislation very carefully and give the greatest consideration to sending it to the Foreign Relations Committee, which is our expert body, to advise us on whether or not the proposed legislation would indeed constitute an insult to our good friend, Canada.

Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to begin my speech, because I have been dealing only with the speech of my good friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who placed a brief in the RECORD earlier in the day, feeling that thereby he could save time. I admire him for that. Such action is always helpful. This is such an important brief that I feel I should discuss it line by line. Then I can begin my own speech.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Does not the fact that yesterday, on the basis of the leadership of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], Representative O'BRIEN, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], it was possible to develop 46 votes, indicate an absence of meritorious facts supporting the conclusions which were reached?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I will say to my good friend from Ohio that there is no question about the fact that there is a great power complex working for the bill. The minority leader, the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], is primarily interested in the bill.

The fact is that the Senator from Texas has not indicated at all what the position of the leadership is on the bill. It is not a policy bill. He has voted, as he has every right to, as a Senator from Texas. But he has made no speech on the bill. He has not urged any Senator, to my knowledge, to vote for or to vote against the bill. He has acted with complete propriety, so far as I am concerned, on the bill. But we still have a power situation here. We have the minority leader, on the one hand, with the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who is a great influence in this body, on the other. We have the very powerful, influential Representative O'BRIEN, of Illinois, working night and day on the bill. When we are confronted with that kind of situation, I think it is really amazing that we were almost able to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, considering that terrific amount of power.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the Senator from Wisconsin want to infer that those who voted for diversion were voting on the basis of personality, and that those who voted the other way were voting on the merits of the proposal?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I certainly would not admit that the Senators who voted for the bill were voting only on the basis of personality. I am sure no Senator would vote for the bill if he felt that it was wrong to do so. But I think it is true that most Senators have not given the bill much study. That is perfectly understandable. The bill does not affect the States of many Senators. It is not a national bill; primarily, it affects the Great Lakes States. So Senators have done what is perfectly sensible. They have followed the first principle of a good executive. They have delegated their judgment to people whom they trust in life. They have said, in effect, to such persons, "You are a fine person, having good judgment. In this case, if you say it is all right, I will give the bill all the study I have a chance to give it, which is only a matter of minutes." There is no reflection on the judgment, honor, or ability of any Senator.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the point I wanted to make. I was concerned, I might say, with possible reflections on the personality of the opponents. I do not want the RECORD to show that in a personality contest the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], for example, fell short of some other Senator or some Member of the House, or the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], or even the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING]. I would not want the RECORD to show that his personality was, by comparison, deficient.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I say to the Senator from Minnesota that it may well be that my colleagues are men of great personal persuasiveness. I know they have been extremely effective in this matter. The point is—and I think the RECORD shows it—that we have been spending our time arguing the merits of the bill on the floor of the Senate. We have not been spending our time trying to persuade Senators how to vote on it. We have been trying to call the attention of Senators exactly to what the issues are. While I would agree that the personality of my good friends is matchless, or is not at least——

Mr. McCARTHY. Comparable.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Comparable in every way, nevertheless the fact is that most of them, with the possible exception of a very few of us, have been deeply concerned with other proposed legislation now pending and have not devoted as much time or as much effort to persuading our colleagues as have the proponents of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Does the Senator from Wisconsin feel that the junior Senator from New York would have some reason to resent the reference by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], after listening to these various Senators, saying "Even the Senator from New York?" It seemed to me to be a highly disparaging statement. I am sure it was not intended to be so, because of the long friendship the Senator from Minnesota and I have enjoyed and because of our close work together in the House. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will be more careful in the future.

Mr. McCARTHY. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD often fails to show the tone of voice which a Senator uses. If I did use the word "even," as the Senator points out, that would really indicate my surprise that the Senator from Wisconsin could have thought that personality was not running on his side rather than on the other side, when he indicated that there was personality only on one side, and merits only on his side.

Mr. KEATING. I think that is a wonderful clarification. I appreciate the fine statement of the Senator from Minnesota. It makes me feel much better.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am sure we are both relieved.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am about finished with my comments on the statement of the Senator from Illinois. The last paragraph, however, is a paragraph which I must read. I think it is perhaps the strongest and best paragraph in his statement. I call it to the attention of the Senate. He says:

> Basically, the power of the court and Congress are independent. Congress can foreclose the court, but the court in this field cannot foreclose Congress. Until Congress ousts the court of jurisdiction, their actions can be concurrent, and there is no reason why either cannot act, being mindful of the fact that the power of Congress is paramount.

Let us assume that that is correct. I shall not argue the point; I am not a constitutional lawyer. I am sure many Senators are eminent constitutional lawyers. I cannot dispute that. The fact is that Congress can recognize in some cases that matters of riparian rights, matters of complex, technical, public health factors, matters of power and navigation, can very often be left to the determination of a judicial body, particularly when that judicial body has demonstrated competence over a period of many years, particularly when there has been no substantial complaint that that body was acting in an unfair or biased way. Certainly the Supreme Court of the United States has met this test in every way.

Up to 1936, the Supreme Court exercised jurisdiction. They have restricted diversion; sometimes they have reduced it; at other times they have permitted an increase. The Supreme Court has exercised jurisdiction continuously. No one questions their competence. The Senator from Illinois has not made any statement to question the ability or competence of Circuit Judge Albert B. Maris, who has been appointed as a referee to study this case.

It seems to me that the last paragraph of the memorandum of the Senator from Illinois, while it might be used as a justification for Congress to act if Congress felt that the Supreme Court was incompetent to do the job, or if it felt that the Supreme Court was not going to do a complete job, considering the interest of Chicago and the States concerned, it would seem to me that when the case is overwhelming that the Supreme Court has given this matter great attention, a large amount of time, and has given Judge Maris every power to subpena witnesses to inquire into this matter in great detail; under those circumstances I can see no reason why Congress should step in and arbitrarily usurp the power the Court has had in this matter and say that a decision carefully reached by the Court to limit diversion to 1,500 cubic feet a second, plus domestic pumpage, should be increased, is an action which is not responsible or thoughtful or considerate, or that recognizes the great competence and care which the Court has demonstrated in the past.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the Senator from Wisconsin aware of a telegram which I have just received from Rene Dupuis, Commissioner of the Quebec Hydroelectric Commission, bearing on additional losses to the Province of Quebec which would result from a diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second of water, as proposed by the bill?

Mr. PROXMIRE. If the Senator would read the telegram, I could answer the question. I am not certain I understand its purport.

Mr. JAVITS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he is aware of the following telegram I have just received, addressed to me, from Rene Dupuis, Commissioner, Quebec Hydroelectric Commission:

MONTREAL, CANADA.

Senator JACOB JAVITS,
Senate Office Building, Washington D.C.:

Electrical losses to hydro Quebec for a 1-year period with increased diversion of 1,000 c.f.s. will actually be 52,596,000 kilowatt-hours and 6,750 kilowatts. Permanent diversion when contemplated Lachine site is developed will bring above figures to 85,468,000 kilowatt-hours and 10,900 kilowatts. Market is always available for such productions.

RENE DUPUIS,
Commissioner, Quebec Hydro-Electric Commission.

May I ask the Senator whether he is aware of that communication?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am not aware of that communication. I am very happy that the Senator from New York has called it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to propound my question to the Senator. I assume the Senator, not being aware of the telegram, or at least not in the detail I have just given it, is also not aware of the computation of the cost of this diversion to Canada, which would result.

I should like to ask the Senator whether he would adopt as a part of his argument the figures which I have had computed by the engineers for the New York State Power Authority as to the additional loss which would be involved?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should like to hear what those figures are.

Mr. JAVITS. I might add that even the question can be somewhat extended in its detail, so I hope the Senator will bear with me while I put this question to him.

I ask the Senator whether he would be prepared to adopt a figure computed for me by the engineers for the New York State Power Authority, namely, the figure of $264,131, as the additional loss represented by the power loss specified in this telegram from the Commissioner of the Quebec Hydroelectric Power Commission; and also the additional figure—should the proposed diversion become permanent—of $427,691, assuming that the proposed 1,000 cubic feet of water a second diversion became permanent, as being the computed loss to the Quebec plants?

Mr. PROXMIRE. If the Senator from New York will question me on whether I would accept that loss figure if it were for the annual loss or if it were for the loss over the 15-year period during which, as I understand, it is generally agreed that the diversion would have its effect, then I would be able to answer the question.

Mr. JAVITS. I ask those questions in exactly the way the Senator from Wisconsin has stated them. In other words, would the Senator from Wisconsin accept as the proper figures for the losses the figures I have just now submitted to him?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would be glad to accept the opinion of that body, which I understand is the most authoritative and the most competent one to pass on that loss, since it has jurisdiction and responsibility for that power facility, and it seems to me that its estimates should be accepted as authoritative.

I may point out to the Senator from New York that those figures contradict the position taken by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], which is that a 1-year test would result in an annual power loss, at Niagara and the St. Lawrence, of $36,000 a year, or $608,000 over the 15-year period.

Mr. JAVITS. Would the Senator from Wisconsin prefer to rely on the figures I gave in my speech on this issue—namely, $1,125,800, as given by the engineers for the New York State Power Authority; or would he prefer to accept the figures given by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] in his speech?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would prefer to accept the figures given by the Senator from New York, for the reason that the Senator from Illinois cited two authorities, one of whom was identified only as "Smith," and of course that gentleman could be one of the many thousands of Smiths in the Nation, and no indication was given in regard to his occupation. The other authority cited by the Senator from Illinois was a Mr. Ramey, who, as most of us know, has been in the employ of the Chicago Sanitary District. Although he is a fine engineer, it is my understanding that he is not well qualified to pass on the question of power losses; or, at least, certainly he is not as well qualified as is in the New York Power Authority.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the Senator from Wisconsin also aware of the fact that the loss figure I cited—namely $1,125,800—is quite different and apart from the loss figures I submitted just now, which are in regard to the Quebec plants, irrespective of the International Rapids and Niagara Falls—namely, $264,131 and $427,691?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was not aware of that. In other words, the two are to be added together, in order to compute the total loss?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes. My question is whether either the $264,131, if one is considering only the diversion specified in this bill, is used——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is the Senator from New York asking me a question?

Mr. JAVITS. I am asking the Senator from Wisconsin a question in regard to the acceptance of these figures. I point out that I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he understands clearly that the $264,131 loss, which relates to the diversion specified in the bill, or the $427,691 loss, which relates to the loss if the diversion were made permanent, must be added to the $1,125,800 loss attributable to the operations at Niagara Falls and the International Rapids?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand it now, although I did not understand it before. I think the Senator from New York has made that very clear, and that is a real contribution to the debate.

Although I had discussed those losses before, and had said I would question them, I had not been able to pin down the New York Power Authority loss figures. With the help of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] I had been able to show that the navigation loss would be more substantial, on a permanent basis, than that which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] seemed to have indicated in the course of his statement.

Mr. JAVITS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin also understand the contractual relationships arising out of the treaty between the United States and Canada, which would require the State of New York, in its power operations, to take up such losses as were suffered by Canada, as a result of the proposed water diversion, in the case of the operations at Niagara Falls? Is the Senator from Wisconsin aware of the relationship or the privity of interest there?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that would be very likely the case—namely, that Canada would be free to appeal to the International Joint Commission and to show—and would have great merit for showing—that even if the entire loss were to be absorbed by New York, and even if as little of the loss as possible were to be absorbed by Canada, even then Canada would not be fully compensated for the loss which she necessarily would have to suffer—and there are technical reasons for that; namely, that Canada could not take the loss at Niagara, but would have to take it where the fall was shorter—and that, therefore, the United States would have to bear almost the entire loss; and, therefore, the loss suffered by the New York Power Authority would be very great.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] was asking me a series of questions.

Mr. JAVITS. I would prefer to continue with my questions, unless the Senator from Illinois wishes to ask a question about this particular matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No.

Mr. JAVITS. Very well.

Does the Senator from Wisconsin find, from the computations made by the proponents of the bill, that they give any consideration whatever to the claims of Canada for compensation for the losses we have been discussing?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I see nothing in the proposed legislation, I see no amendment, I see no proposal, that Canada or New York or the shippers would be compensated.

I have at the desk some amendments which I may call up; and they would provide for such compensation.

Mr. JAVITS. Then will the Senator from Wisconsin give me his view on the questions of constitutionality and expropriation without compensation, which might be involved in this situation, in the absence of even any pretense to make compensation for these at least realizable losses, as well as the losses of which New York might find itself the underwriter?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That could amount to a violation of the due process clause. However, I am not a lawyer. Of course I recognize that the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who is questioning me, was formerly a great attorney general of New York State, and also that he has devoted his life's work to the law, and understands this matter very thoroughly. From his questioning, I understand that it is his conviction that this proposal might very well be unconstitutional.

Mr. JAVITS. Certainly the Senator from Wisconsin would see, would he not, as a nonlawyer, that this matter presents that serious question? The Senator from Wisconsin is aware of that, is he not?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I see that very clearly. It seems to me that it does, indeed, raise that question.

Mr. JAVITS. Could the Senator from Wisconsin also tell me what he sees in the present relationships with Canada which, in his view, would make those relationships either better or worse if the Senate were to proceed unilaterally—in the face of the Canadian protest, which it seems to me is abundantly clear by now—to take action in this situation, by means of passing this bill?

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the first place, I saw a statement by the expert adviser of the U.S. Government—to wit, the State Department—that, "the Department believes that enactment of this bill would have unfortunate repercussion on our relations with a friendly foreign government, and is therefore unable to support the legislation."

I also see a note—and there has been a series of notes; an almost unprecedented number of notes in such a brief time—from Canada, the latest one being dated August 21, after the meeting of the Public Works Committee.

On April 9, there was a note, which has about the clearest language that I have seen in a diplomatic message, in which the Ambassador from Canada wrote the Acting Secretary of State, at that time Christian Herter, and said that the Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago. The note goes on to specify the treaties the Government of Canada thinks would be violated.

There is no question this is a very sincere, well documented conviction on the part of Canada. It is not a matter of saying, We are going to stand up to our big neighbor to the south. It is not simply based on a psychological objection in Canada. It is based on a sincere interpetation of the treaty which, as I understand, competent constitutional authorities say would be violated by this act.

Mr. JAVITS. I shall have some further questions on that matter, and I shall return to make them in a few moments. In the meantime, I should like to hand the Senator a memorandum and ask the Senator to peruse it carefully. Perhaps he will find it worthy of insertion in his remarks as bearing upon the questions which he has answered. I refer to a memorandum on value of power loss by the Quebec Hydroelectric Commission. The memorandum was prepared by engineers of the New York Power Authority.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from New York very much. I expect at a later moment to insert this memorandum into the RECORD.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from New York has made available to me a memorandum on power loss. It is an extremely brief memorandum. I ask unanimous consent that this memorandum, from a competent authority, be placed in the RECORD immediately after the colloquy between the Senator from New York and myself. It seems to me that is the place for it. It should clarify the dispute as to the cost of this additional diversion.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON VALUE OF POWER LOSS BY QUEBEC-HYDRO FROM 1,000 CUBIC FEET PER SECOND DIVERSION

Ontario Hydro has stated that the value of electric energy and power generated by steam powerplants to replace the energy and power lost as a result of the proposed additional diversion would be 3.17 mills per kilowatt-hour and $14.43 per kilowatt per year. On this basis the value of the energy and power which Quebec-Hydro would lose as a result of a 1-year diversion at the rate of 1,000 cubic feet per second would be:

6,750 kilowatts × $14.43	97,402
Quebec Hydro loss from 1 year's diversion	$264,131

The annual Quebec Hydro loss from a permanent diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second would be:

85,468,000 kilowatt-hours × $0.00317	$271,504
10,900 kilowatts × $14.43	156,187
Quebec Hydro annual loss from permanent diversion	$427,691

The annual loss is larger than the loss from a 1-year temporary diversion as a result of the contemplated Lachine plant.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I now yield to my good friend from Illinois for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois were to present a petition for cloture, in order to stop the filibuster which the Senator from Wisconsin is now conducting, would the Senator from Wisconsin then vote to apply cloture so that we could get on with the business of the Senate?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I say to my good friend from Illinois that his question is as loaded as the traditional question of when the Senator from Wisconsin is going to stop beating his wife. The Senator from Wisconsin has never beaten his wife. The Senator from Wisconsin is not engaged in a filibuster. The Senator from Illinois should know that the Senator from Wisconsin is not engaged in a filibuster. We have had a number of votes on this bill. We expect to have more votes. We contemplate a vote after we have had a chance to explain the merits or demerits of the bill. As the Senate clearly indicated by its vote yesterday, it wished the proponents and opponents of the bill to discuss it further.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin remember the fact that when the Senator from Illinois proposed that cloture be applied by majority vote the Senator from Wisconsin voted in the affirmative? Does he remember that?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Wisconsin recalls that very well. The Senator——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator——

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator will please desist so that I may complete my answer. The Senator from Wisconsin is very much in favor of a stronger cloture rule. He will be glad to invoke cloture at any time there is an indication that Senators favor ending the debate. I call the attention of my friend from Illinois to the fact that his cloture proposal would have, in his own words, provided 2 months of debate—2 months. The fact is that this bill has been before the Senate for a relatively short time, a tiny fraction of 1 month, let alone 2 months. I will be delighted to tell the Senator from Illinois I have every intention to stop talking on this bill within the next 2 months. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). The Senate will be in order, and visitors in the galleries will remain silent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator remember that his assistants in this filibuster, namely, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], all voted for a change in the rules so that the majority could apply cloture? Does he remember that?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Wisconsin remembers it very well. I do not think it is in the least embarrassing. I am glad the Senator from Illinois has finally entered the debate. I regret that he has refused to debate any of the issues relating to the Supreme Court, Canada, and the opposition of agencies to the bill. Instead, the Senator from Illinois chooses to attack the Senator from Wisconsin on the ground that the Senator from Wisconsin is conducting a filibuster, when the Senator from Illinois recognizes that his own provision for cloture permitted 2 months of discussion.

I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to ask the Senator what is his characterization of the quality of the note from the Government of Canada, dated April 9, 1959, as it affects this controversy. May I read the note to my colleague as a part of the question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator identify the date of the note again?

Mr. JAVITS. April 9, 1959.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Fine.

Mr. JAVITS. I read from that letter:

Every diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreases the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes. The Government of Canada is opposed to any action which will have the effect of reducing the volume of water in the Great Lakes Basin. Careful inquiry has failed to reveal any sources of water in Canada which could be added to the present supplies of the basin to compensate for further withdrawals in the United States.

The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago.

Because of the importance attached by the United States and Canada to the honoring of international undertakings in letter and in spirit, the Government of Canada views with serious concern any possible impairment of agreements and undertakings relating to the Great Lakes Basin. Furthermore, the alarms created by repeated proposals for diversion which inevitably disturb the people and industry of Canada are a source of profound irritation to the relations between our two countries which we can ill afford.

I am instructed, therefore, to express the hope of the Government of Canada that the United States will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes Basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

I ask the Senator, what is his opinion as to the quality of that kind of protest from the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States as it bears on the pending legislation?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would say to the Senator from New York that it is firm, it is emphatic, it is clear, it states the position of a proud sovereign nation, which is convinced that such legislation will violate solemn treaties, and the Government of Canada says so in the most unequivocal language which the Senator has yet read. I am particularly delighted he has read the last sentence, which I had not read before. I do not think it has been called to the attention of Senators before. It is such a modest and reasonable request. That is why the bill should go to the Foreign Relations Committee. I should like to read it again. This is the Canadian ambassador solemnly saying to the Acting Secretary of State:

I am instructed, therefore, to express the hope of the Government of Canada that the United States will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes Basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

I submit, whether we think they are correct or whether we think they are incorrect, the least we can do is to honor the solemn note, by letting the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body take a look at the matter and consider it.

Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the proponents of the bill could not be inconvenienced by such action. I have counted the votes on the Committee on Foreign Relations. As I understand, there are 17 members of the committee. The proponents of the bill have some 10 or 11 votes, and the opponents have some 5 or 6 votes.

The fact is that the bill would come back to the Senate, because we would put instructions on the action. We would tell the committee when to report the bill. It would be early in the next session.

There is no question that we should have the advice of the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is no question that the bill would have a hospitable, understanding, and courteous consideration by the Committee on Foreign Relations. This is the most modest kind of a request.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to continue these questions of the Senator, which we did not quite finish before.

I should like to ask the Senator to tell me what in his view would be the effect upon our relations with Canada if we should pass the bill, in the light of the following statement culled from the Canadian note of August 21, 1959:

In the view of my Government any additional diversion of water out of the Great Lakes watershed would be inconsistent with existing agreements and arrangements which together constitute an agreed regime with respect to these waters. The proposed unilateral derogation from the existing regime therefore occasions serious concern in Canada.

What does my colleague believe would be the effect upon Canadian-United States relations if, in the face of that statement, the Senate should pass the bill under consideration?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Well, of course, the critical words are: "Occasions serious concern in Canada." As I understand the situation, this is the strongest kind of diplomatic language. It is a matter of grave import, particularly, for a good friend and a good neighbor to use this kind of language with regard to a bill which is under consideration.

In the brief time in which I have been a Member of the Senate, and the opportunity I had to study the Senate before I became a Member, I know of no other bill—there may have been a few—with regard to which any foreign power indicated it had a serious concern, or that it would occasion serious concern among its people.

I think this language means that Canada is saying, in effect, "If you do this, we will feel you have done it against our express understandings; that you have broken your word on the basis of what we think is your word."

I think any person would expect Canada to feel it would be perfectly free to act with respect to the Columbia River any way it wished. It could act, furthermore, with great damage to New York with respect to the diversion from the Hudson Bay watershed of the water which is diverted, some 5,000 cubic feet per second, into Lake Superior. It could take all of that water, which it shares with the United States, although Canada has gone to great expense to divert the water, has indulged in all the labor, and has made all the sacrifice for it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. JAVITS. Does the Senator place in the words in this note which I have read, "unilateral derogation," the same impact and effect I place in them; that it is really an accusation that the United States is proceeding on its own without reference to the international responsibilities and obligations which are involved?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There can be no question about it. The words are "unilateral derogation." They mean it is the understanding of Canada that we will act without consultation, without reference, and without consideration of the Canadian interests. It means Canada feels we are acting by ourselves, that we arrogate this power to ourselves, and that we are ignoring the perfectly legitimate power and influence Canada should have in these circumstances.

Mr. JAVITS. Does the Senator feel that if a bill like this passes in the face of these protests, we would be hearing the end of it with these protests, or does the Senator feel we would hear more about it from Canada?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is no question in my mind that if this bill were passed in these circumstances, Canada as a proud nation would feel that although they had informed us that we were breaking our word in acting in this way, we had gone ahead and done it, that we had ignored its protests; and that Canada would have little choice but to take action which could be very damaging to this country.

Mr. JAVITS. As a person in political life himself, does the Senator envisage a situation in which a political storm could blow up in Canada over just such an act as this by the Senate of the United States?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from New York raises an excellent point, because those who have observed the Canadian Government recognize that while they have been wonderful friends, and while Canada is a source of tremendous importance to us, both in a friendly way and as a great ally, and as a great place for investments, and so forth, the fact is that Canada is a smaller nation than ours. They have fewer people. They have less wealth. The psychology under these circumstances is always bound to be nationalistic with reference to the smaller country.

That has been brought out in many ways. Any realistic observer would recognize that the reason why Mr. Diefenbaker was elected by an overwhelming majority in the last election was that he was going to operate with independence of the colossus to the south, that he was representing a nation that was proud of its sovereignty, a nation that was nationalistic in the good sense, and that was going to insist that it be respected. If we enact the pending measure, I think Canadians will have reason to feel that their sovereignty is being challenged, is being disregarded, is being insulted, and that it is not being respected by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JAVITS. If a political storm is blowing up as a result of the unilateral derogation of the relationships to which Canada referred in this note, does the Senator know of a whole list of vexatious issues which could be raised between the United States and Canada, quite apart from this one, and which would be extremely harmful to us? They might be to them, too, but they would certainly be extremely harmful to us.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is absolutely correct. One area I have referred to very briefly and inadequately has been an area the distinguished junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] discussed at some length yesterday, and the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] has discussed it before today, one which I think must be called to the attention of the Senate again. It is that Canada is in a position to divert waters from the Columbia River into the Fraser River and send them into the Pacific Ocean without their going through the United States at all, water from the Columbia River which would reduce the power potential of the Columbia River in Oregon and Washington by the huge amount of 23 percent. This would be jeopardizing the Hanford atomic work. It would be very, very harmful to dams in these States. Anyone who knows anything about the Northwest recognizes that one of its great strengths is that it has an abundance of power, and that when that abundance is cut, the very economic life of the area is damaged and compromised.

The Dominion of Canada could act, has every right to consider acting, and it would be certainly sorely tempted to act.

Also, as I said a moment ago, the Dominion of Canada could act with regard to the present diversion of 5,000 cubic feet per second from the Hudson Bay watershed, which they have accomplished by investing a great deal of money and a great deal of time and a great deal of effort, diverting this additional water into Lake Superior so that it would come down the Niagara, come down Niagara Falls and down the St. Lawrence. We have some advantage in this, and they have been generous in that they have shared it with us. They could take all of this away from us, at great loss to us, a loss of several million dollars. I have been advised by the New York Power Authority that this is a very real possibility. These are just two of the most immediate instances.

The fact is that Canada has been a wonderful ally in every respect. They worked closely with us in the United Nations and in NATO, and in many other ways.

So it would seem to me that in the great sweep of Canadian-American relations, it is fantastically unwise for the Congress of the United States to pass a bill not only over the objections of Canada, but without even referring that bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, so that that committee can tell us whether or not we should be concerned about the Canadian objection.

Mr. JAVITS. And does the Senator feel that the fact that Canada is our largest customer in terms of exports—I believe it is our largest—and that Canada is the situs of a very large proportion of the total foreign profit investments of the United States, also gives us a tremendous national interest in not allowing a political storm to break out in Canada over a matter of unilateral derogation of this character?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Absolutely. The Senator from New York is absolutely correct. It is by far our best customer. It is the country in which we have made extremely important and valuable investments. There is no question that they have been mutually beneficial.

There is also the question that a worsening of political relations could easily lead to a worsening of economic relations, and at great and serious damage to our investments and to our economy, and in many other ways.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from New York for his excellent questions, and the extremely valuable colloquy we have had.

During the colloquy between Mr. PROXMIRE and Mr. JAVITS:

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may ask the distinguished Senator a question?

Mr. JAVITS. I am pursuing a particular line of inquiry. It is up to the Senator from Wisconsin as to whom he wishes to yield. I would be perfectly happy to have him yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a question, with the understanding that the ensuing colloquy with the Senator from New York will follow our present colloquy in the RECORD, and that my colloquy with the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed after I finish my colloquy with the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, is the pending amendment by the Senator from Wisconsin one to change the language on page 3 of the bill, in lines 22 and 23, from "one hundred and seventy-five miles of Lake Michigan" to "one hundred and eighty miles of Lake Michigan"? Is that the pending amendment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Oklahoma is correct.

I might explain to my good friend, the Senator from Oklahoma, the reason why I introduced the particular amendment at the particular time. I think it is a good amendment, and I think it should be agreed to. I introduced the amendment at the particular time—and I made clear to the Senate at the time why—because I wanted to yield to my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], who wanted the floor yesterday and wanted an opportunity to speak for 10 minutes. The senior Senator from Illinois refused to permit me to yield without losing my right to the floor, so, in order that I could speak more than two times, as I desired, I introduced the amendment to provide for the 180 miles, so that I would be able to speak on the bill and on the particular issue which seems to concern the Senate at this moment especially, as to whether the proposed legislation should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERR. I wanted to say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, if he really thinks it is a good amendment, Mr. President, as the manager of the bill on the floor I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as I have explained to my good friend from Oklahoma, I very much appreciate his willingness to accept the amendment. I should like to consider that matter a little later on, with the Senator's indulgence.

Mr. KERR. My willingness is not binding either on the Senator or on the Senate, but I did want to make the announcement, as manager of the bill on the floor. I yield to the Senator's judgment in the matter. It is a good amendment, and I wished to say to the Senator that I would be glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I appreciate the very generous proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma. Under the circumstances I would greatly prefer, since the Senator has said this is no commitment, but his mind will be open, to make that decision at a later time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin mean he does not know whether he is in favor of his own amendment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. No. The position of the Senator from Wisconsin is that he favors his amendment enthusiastically.

I want to have my amendment agreed to. However, I want to have an opportunity to speak on the proposed legislation, because I think it is extremely important. I want to be able to speak at sufficient length to get my views across.

There is a parliamentary situation in which, if I accept the generous offer of my good friend from Oklahoma, I would be able to speak only one time more.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin mean that he offered the amendment merely as a subterfuge, in order to get a chance to talk interminably on this issuse?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Absolutely not. If my good friend from Illinois had had an opportunity to hear what I said, he would recognize that I said, as I said yesterday when I offered the amendment, it is a good amendment. It has merit.

I am in favor of the amendment. It would include Kewaunee, Wisconsin; and Kewaunee is very important to me.

However, I wanted to offer the amendment at the time so that I could talk without being taken off my feet by the very expert parliamentarian who is opposing my viewpoint.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I correctly understand that the Senator is not in favor of his amendment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I say to my good friend from Illinois, I favor the amendment enthusiastically. I am deferring, however, the request or the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma until a later time, when the parliamentary situation may be a little different.

In view of the fact that the Senator has conceded, by his suggestion to me, that the amendment has some merit, I hope and I presume the Senator will accept it at a later time. He may not. The Senator is perfectly free not to accept the amendment.

However, I make the point, first, it is a good amendment. I favor it. I am proud of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, if it is a good amendment, why does the Senator not accept the proposal?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Because it would put the Senator from Illinois in a position where he could take the Senator from Wisconsin off his feet. The Senator from Illinois knows perfectly well that the parliamentary situation permits him to prevent the Senator from Wisconsin from yielding to another Senator who wants to be accommodated, as Senators do during the course of a discussion of this kind. If the Senator should yield to other Senators, he could speak only twice. Therefore, if I yielded within a period of 5 minutes to two different Senators I would be through, as an example.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I correctly understand that what the Senator from Wisconsin is interested in is the chance to talk without let or hindrance, interminably, and to tie up the business of the Senate; and that the Senator is not interested in getting the pending amendment agreed to?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois is wrong on both counts. The position of the Senator from Wisconsin is that he wishes to talk on the amendment, probably at a later time. The Senator from Wisconsin is using the introduction of the amendment at this time, however, so that he will be able to talk on the issue which seems to concern the Senate very deeply, which is the issue of whether the bill should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In order to discuss that subject adequately and properly, we have to have time for discussion. Therefore, I introduced the amendment.

We also should have a discussion of whether there is any positive merit in the bill, which would influence the Senate to vote for the bill, even though it might offend Canada.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I did not quite clearly hear the complete statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin which had in it a reference to the Senator from Illinois and some mention of counts.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Some mention of what? Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. LAUSCHE. Yes, I am asking the Senator a question. Will the Senator from Wisconsin repeat what he said about the Senator from Illinois and some counts? Did the Senator from Wisconsin say the Senator from Illinois was wrong on both counts?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes. I thank the Senator from Ohio. I said that the Senator from Illinois was wrong on both the two counts.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I did not hear what the Senator from Wisconsin said.

Mr. KEATING. On how many counts was the Senator wrong?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Two out of two. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Wisconsin would make a unanimous-consent request that I be permitted to make some extraneous remarks at this point.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New Jersey without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECENT CHINESE COMMUNIST ACTS OF BELLIGERENCE

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on the borders of India, in Laos, and in Tibet, the Western World is now faced with three new instances of Red Chinese belligerence and disrespect for human rights.

On Friday the Prime Minister of India, Pandit Nehru, announced that Chinese troops had crossed from Tibet into the northeast frontier area of India and into the Province of Kashmir. This morning, there are reports that a Red Chinese force of nearly 400 has invaded the Indian protectorate of Bhutan. These open acts of hostility must come as further unpleasant notice to the Government of India of the aggressive nature of its powerful northern neighbor.

This country has not always shared the expressed views of Mr. Nehru on the nature of communism, nor has our Government always seen eye to eye with Mr. Nehru on matters of policy, but I suggest, Mr. President, that the realities of Communist power and Communist intentions must now be coming into focus throughout south and southeastern Asia.

I would therefore urge, Mr. President, that we remain alert and sympathetic to the needs of India in her trials with her aggressive neighbor to the north. It may be that we can be of assistance to India in building her military defenses against communism as we are now assisting her to build her economic defenses. These defenses are not only India's but those of all free nations. Indian independence as well as successful Indian economic development are crucial to the success of constitutional government in Asia and much of Africa.

It may be that India will at some point wish to appeal for assistance to the United Nations to patrol her borders or for some other U.N. procedures for the settlement of disputes. To any such appeals from India, Mr. President, we should give most careful and sympathetic consideration.

In the tiny kingdom of Laos, Mr. President, Communist guerrillas have infiltrated from the Communist country of North Vietnam under the Ho Chi Minh regime. There can be no doubt of the support given to Ho Chi Minh and the Communist guerrillas from the Peiping government to the north.

I am glad to note that our Government is already airlifting military equipment to Laos, in addition to increasing our economic aid. It is not yet known whether large-scale assistance will be necessary.

I understand that representatives of the Government of Laos have conferred informally with the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Hammarskjold, on the possible courses of action open to it. Here too the United Nations may be able to play a constructive role.

A third area where the belligerence of recent Red Chinese actions belies Peiping's assurances of peaceful intent is the once independent land of Tibet. This peaceful land of the Lamas received assurances of respect for its internal autonomy and religious and cultural freedom in its agreement of 1951 with the Chinese Communists. Despite continuing heroic resistance by Khamba tribesmen in some parts of the country, the Red Chinese tide has engulfed the land. The hollowness of Red China's promises was dramatized for all the world to see in the forced flight of the Dalai Lama and his followers.

Mr. President, the International Commission of Jurists has prepared a carefully documented study of the recent deplorable events in Tibet, entitled "The Question of Tibet and the Rule of Law." This report finds, among other things, that there is a prima facie case of a systematic Red Chinese intention to destroy in whole or in part the Tibetans as a separate nation and the Buddhist religion in Tibet. The Commission, an unofficial body representing some 30,000 jurists from 50 countries expresses the earnest hope that this matter will be taken up by the United Nations. "Somewhere," the report's section on the violation of human rights concludes, "there must be sufficient moral strength left in the world to seek the truth through the world's highest international organ." On Monday of this week, the Dalai Lama appealed to the United Nations to take up the Communist suppression of his kingdom.

Mr. President, the complicated situations surrounding the Chinese Communist belligerence in India, in Laos, and in Tibet must each be met in different ways appropriate to the local circumstances. But I submit they have many things in common which we can neglect only at our peril. All of these cases reflect the aggressive expansionism of Red China, compounded of economics and the lust for power, and fired by a particularly pugnacious variant of the Communist ideology. Each of these cases must be met with vigilance and with firm strength—military, economic, and moral. And in each of these cases there is, given these prior conditions, an opportunity for the peaceful settlement processes of the United Nations and for the mobilized power of world public opinion to play a role.

We certainly have new evidence, if any were needed, of the continued aggressiveness and expansionism of Red China. But this has long been true. What is new is that the countries of the Far East are now beginning to realize the true nature of the Red Chinese regime. This is a hopeful sign, and tremendously important. The first essential in building resistance to Communist aggression is for countries to recognize the threat. Only after this has happened can outside help, whether military or economic, be truly effective.

I do not mean to imply, Mr. President, that this change in Asia is something that has occurred wholly within the past few days or weeks, important as the events of this period have been. Rather, this has been only the climax of a gradual change stemming both from improved internal conditions in Asiatic countries, and from the shattering of illusions held in these countries as to the nature of communism and of Western democracy.

Early last month, Ernest K. Lindley summarized the conclusions he drew from a 3-month survey of 17 nations or other political units, from the Middle East to Korea. He wrote in Newsweek, August 10:

> My overall conclusion: The tide has turned in our favor. The appeal, influence, and prestige of communism is waning. Naivete about the objectives of Peiping and Moscow has diminished. Communist techniques are better understood, and most free Asian governments are dealing vigorously with internal subversion. Most free Asian nations have made appreciable gains—in political stability, economic growth, or both. Confidence in us has risen, in both allied and neutralist nations. It is more widely appreciated that we seek nothing special for ourselves—that our only purpose is to help the free Asian peoples to preserve their independence and to advance economically and socially.

Mr. President, the encouraging point in the overall situation is this: Wherever the Communist challenge has been met with vigilance and firm strength, military, economic, and moral, the expansion of communism has been stopped in its tracks. In 11 years the Communists have not gained a square foot of soil in Europe. Now at long last, there are signs that this type of strength in freedom is beginning to develop in Asia, too. And the events on the frontiers of India, in Laos, and in Tibet are certainly speeding this process.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from New York without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for the very fine argument he has been making, and express the view that I believe it will be highly effective in enlightening Members of this body on the issues involved. I feel reasonably confident that when another motion is made to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I intend to make such a motion during the course of this debate, perhaps tomorrow afternoon, or at some other appropriate time—the Senate will fix a more satisfactory date than that contained in the previous motion, for the Committee on Foreign Relations to report the bill back to the Senate.

That motion will be made because I feel very certain that the majority of the membership now realize that this is a question which should be reviewed and surveyed by the committee.

I feel quite confident that due to the excellent presentation made by our distinguished friend from Wisconsin and other Senators, Members will be given an opportunity—which I shall afford them by making a motion sometime during the course of the debate—to consider the question of referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Perhaps Senators will be enlightened enough by tomorrow afternoon to make it appropriate again to have another opportunity to express themselves on the question of referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations for study. Certainly the international ramifications of the problem should be very persuasive in our consideration of the issues involved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—ORDER FOR RECESS TO 10 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the majority leader without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in recess until 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes tomorrow there be the usual morning hour, with limitation on statements of 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question? I wish to be sure that I understood the Senator from Texas. Did the Senator from Texas ask that the Senate convene tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m.?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. The Senate will convene at 10 o'clock a.m., and there will be the usual morning hour.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I presume that the hour of meeting has no bearing on the hour when the Senator from Texas feels that a yea-and-nay vote may be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. A yea-and-nay vote can occur whenever it is desired.

THE PRESIDENT'S INTEREST RATE PROPOSAL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin further yield in order that I may make a few observations on the subject of interest rates?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield with the same understanding, that I do not thereby lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, President Eisenhower in his message to Congress on Tuesday of last week again requested that the ceiling on long-term Treasury bonds be removed. And yet the leadership of Congress does not even seem to be disposed to acknowledge his request. Simply because the issue is a highly complicated one, there are many who would rather play politics with it than give it the forthright and serious consideration which it so urgently requires.

Mr. President, I want to take a few moments this afternoon to discuss what I believe to be the major facts in the controversy over the proposed removal of the interest-rate ceiling on long-term Treasury obligations. It is my strong feeling that these facts should be clearly and fully stated for the RECORD—so that the American people can better understand and judge the meaning of Congress' failure to take action on this vital matter.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS LEGISLATION

In actuality, what we are talking about when we discuss raising the long-term interest rate is the entire management of the public debt. What sort of bonds should be sold? What maturity? To whom should we try to sell them?

Our huge national debt of over $280 billion is a potentially inflationary force of hurricane proportions. It need not be inflationary, however, if in the management of the debt, we keep it out of the banking system as much as possible. I wish to discuss this subject for a minute.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I do not have the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New York may yield to the Senator from Tennessee without my losing the right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator consider an inflationary spiral of interest rates one of the extremely inflationary factors in our economy?

Mr. KEATING. It depends on just where the interest rates are increased, particularly as regards the holding of Government bonds. It depends upon whether those bonds are forced into the banking system or not. That is a very important point. It may not be the only factor, but it is a very important factor in determining whether the huge debt which our country owes is going to cause the entire economy to get out of balance.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. One of the results—one of the intended results—of the tight money policy, the high interest rate policy, of the Eisenhower administration is reflected in an Associated Press dispatch from New York City today, which I read:

> First National City Bank of New York today boosted the prime lending rate from 4½ to 5 percent, effective immediately.

This is the first time in a great many years that the prime rate has been so high. I should like to read another result of this unfortunate, this unwise, this uneconomic, this inflationary tight money policy. I read again from the Associated Press report:

> Government bonds were slipping further below par today, after reaching an all-time low on yesterday. Victory bonds sold at $80^{22}/_{32}$.

That is very serious news for the people who hold those bonds.

Mr. KEATING. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee that this is serious news. The failure of Congress to meet up with this problem is one of the reasons why we are in the situation in which we find ourselves today with regard to the status of Government bonds.

Congress has not faced up to the problem of meeting the competition for investment funds on a long-range basis. The Government is forced, under the policy which is now being pursued by the Government, to do all of its financing on a short-term basis.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will yield, but I should first like to make my statement. Then perhaps I shall be able to enlighten the Senator from Tennessee, although I do not expect to enlighten him by some of the things I propose to say. I should like to be able to continue with my discussion; then I will yield, if the Senator has further questions along this line.

Mr. GORE. First, I express appreciation for the willingness of the able junior Senator from New York to undertake to enlighten the junior Senator from Tennessee. I am surprised that he acknowledges his incapacity to do so. The junior Senator from Tennessee has a mind which is reasonably retentive and is open to hear the suggestions which the able Senator from New York may make, and is regretful that the junior Senator from New York does not recognize his capacity to do so.

Mr. KEATING. I recognize that to be true on many subjects, but not on interest rates. The Senator from Tennessee has made many speeches on this subject which are quite contrary to the remarks I am about to make. The Senator from Tennessee, I would expect, has gotten so far out on a limb on this subject that it would be very difficult for him to retrace his steps. But that is not a general reflection on my good friend from Tennessee. On most matters, with perhaps this one exception, he has an extremely open mind. I regret that on this one subject I am afraid I would not be able to assist him.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York further yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Then the junior Senator from Tennessee will undertake to impart some enlightenment to the junior Senator from New York. The conclusion which he stated earlier that the refusal of Congress to approve higher interest rates had forced interest rates up is without justification or foundation. Had Congress approved the high-interest-rate policy, the prime rate might well be 6 percent today instead of 5 percent. One of the proudest acts of this session of Congress is its demonstration of courage and fortitude to resist pressures to place its stamp of approval upon the high-interest-rate policy, which has brought about the disastrous results to which I have already referred.

Mr. KEATING. It is an indication of something, but I would not care to characterize it as courage and fortitude. I would not, because of the rules of the Senate, feel free to characterize it in the manner which is going through my mind. But it is certainly not a demonstration, in my judgment, of courage and fortitude.

If we sell Government bonds to nonbank investors, the money we get is money that has been earned and saved. It represents what economists call the real savings of the community. This course is not inflationary.

On the other hand, selling Government bonds to banks is directly inflationary.

When the Treasury sells bonds to a commercial bank, the Treasury in effect opens an account in the bank for the full amount of the bonds. Then, when the Treasury pays a bill to, for example, a defense contractor, the contractor draws the money out of the Government's account into an account in his own bank. The money supply has thus been expanded by the full amount of the bonds.

THE COMING CRISIS IN DEBT MANAGEMENT

The alarming thing is that banks are coming to hold more and more of the public debt. Last year the total debt rose by $6.2 billion. The amount owned by banks rose by almost twice this amount—by $11.4 billion. Banks now hold 33 percent of the debt.

The converse of this is the way private, nonbank investors have been shunning U.S. debt obligations. In 1958, less of the debt was held by nonbank investors, percentagewise, than at any time since the war. While gross public debt rose last year, the amount owned by private nonbank investors actually declined by $5.6 billion.

Particularly ominous is the fact that the movement out of U.S. Government securities has been most pronounced among the more informed or, let us say sophisticated investors. Insurance companies, for example, used to hold around 19 percent of the Federal debt. They now own less than 5 percent. In dollars and cents, the assets of insurance companies have risen from about $45 billion to over $100 billion since 1945. That is well over twice as much. Yet their ownership of Government securities has dropped from $20 billion to $7 billion since 1945. Mutual savings banks have also cut their holdings of Treasury bonds sharply.

THE REASON FOR THE CRISIS

The basic explanation for all of this is simple. We are riding the wave of a tremendous economic advance. Employment, income, and output have been rising rapidly. The demands for investment funds are great and are going to be greater. Corporations, large and small, all want cash to expand. The demand for mortgage funds has grown just as rapidly. The current rate at which we are building houses is an all-time high. Local and State governments, having vital public services to finance, are increasingly becoming reconciled to the need to compete actively for the necessary credit. The Federal income tax exemption on municipal and State bonds puts them in a particularly advantageous position.

THE ONLY REALISTIC COURSE

The Nation's growing economic boom has created a highly competitive demand for real savings. The Treasury, if it is going to continue to seek nonbank investors for long-term Federal obligations, must compete with the several other contenders for the Nation's real savings, for these savings are the only source of credit—other than the printing press. The Treasury must offer a competitive interest rate. It cannot continue to have its hands tied by an unrealistic interest-rate ceiling.

Mr. President, we have heard what I regard as a great deal of nonsense—namely, statements to the effect that the bankers are getting the lion's share from any increase in Treasury rates. The fundamental reason for making long-term Treasury rates competitive is just the opposite. It is to keep the national debt out of the banking system, so that it will not be inflationary. If banks are in favor of this proposal, it is simply because of their long-run self-interest in a stable price level. This is a self-interest which all of us could share.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Tennessee may ask a question of the Senator from New York, without causing me to lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator from New York realize that the former Secretary of the Treasury, George M. Humphrey, made the same argument that the junior Senator from New York is now making, as the reason why he artificially increased the interest rate, thus offering Government bonds at needlessly high interest rates? He stated as his excuse for doing so that he wanted to sell more long-term bonds. But at the time when Secretary Humphrey left office, there were fewer long-term bonds outstanding than there were at the time when he entered that office.

The same argument has been made over and over and over. So what the able Senator is saying is nothing new. It has been tried, and has been proven to be fallacious.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the comments of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, made in support of the arguments he has been making on this floor day after day, are all very well and good. I do not know about the argument made by the former Secretary of the Treasury. But I am stating a few facts which I wish to have understood. Of course, those who keep shouting about low interest rates do not like to have those facts brought to their attention.

These facts are not being brought out by the former Secretary of the Treasury. But the junior Senator from New York is presenting them at this time, and desires to present a few more of them before he yields the floor.

Mr. President, the very highly respected financial writer, J. A. Livingston, has discussed in the following strong terms the President's interest rate proposal:

> In the meantime, Congress has no alternative. It must grant Secretary Anderson freedom to finance in the open market. It will have to raise the interest ceiling on bonds above 4¼ percent—in case he has to use it. Anderson's fix is everybody's fix.

I may say that every financial writer whose articles I have read—although I may have missed some—more or less supports the same position.

The Washington Post and Times Herald put the matter this way in a recent editorial:

> It is simply a case of the Piper having done his work and having to be paid. All the congressional breast beating in favor of cheaper money cannot alter that situation. Bond rates and the debt limit must be raised if the Treasury is to operate in a rational manner, and we trust that when the opportunities for exploiting the lamentable public ignorance on money matters have been exhausted, Congress will do what must be done.

AN ALTERNATIVE—RELY EXCLUSIVELY ON SHORT-TERM NOTES

Not long ago, the junior Senator from Wisconsin suggested here on the floor, as a feasible alternative to raising the long-term rate, that the Treasury use short-term obligations exclusively in the management of the public debt.

This is a remarkable position. Why is it all right for the Treasury to jump into the short-term market with both feet, but morally reprehensible to put out an issue in the long-term market at competitive rates? If the Treasury put all the debt into short-term issues, the short-term interest rate would skyrocket. But, according to the junior Senator from Wisconsin, raising short-term rates would be all right; raising long-term rates would not be all right.

In a colloquy which occurred here on the floor a short time ago, my good friend, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], who has been so kind as to yield to me at this time, said to me:

> There is no limit, as the Senator from New York well knows, on short-term obligations of less than 5 years. There is no reason why the short-term debt which comes due during the next 18 months cannot be refunded on the same basis.

Mr. President, I fail to understand why those who advocate the so-called easy-money policy or the low-money policy are willing to let the Treasury compete in the short-term market, but are unwilling to move an inch to change the arbitrary 4¼ percent long-term ceiling.

I should like to have the critics of higher long-term rates answer several questions. Why has the administration chosen a course of interest-rate flexibility? If it is so easy and painless to proceed in another way, why does the administration choose this politically unpopular way?

There is no question that it is very easy to sell the idea of low interest rates. That idea has a great appeal on the surface, until we dig into the problem and realize what our country is up against, not only here at home, but also in its relationships with the other countries of the world.

I believe that on September 28 there is to be a meeting of the financial representatives of all the principal nations of the world. If it becomes apparent at such a meeting that this country cannot handle and cannot properly finance its obligations, that would be an extremely serious problem in connection with our relationship with the other nations of the world. The critics of the policy which the administration has requested know full well how difficult it is for responsible people to talk about interest rate flexibility, when it is so easy to make irresponsible charges and insinuations about a field with which few are conversant. I would be the first to concede my own shortcomings in this very complex field.

But I believe it is crystal clear that the administration would not have chosen to brave this politically unpopular course, were it not for one reason: Interest-rate flexibility is the only sound course for America. It is the only honest way of facing the debt management crisis and dealing with the root of the problem.

Earlier this year, I think we demonstrated the wisdom and the realism of Congress, when it was proposed to freeze below the competitive level interest rates on veterans' housing mortgages. At that time, we heard all the arguments. We then moved quietly to vote, by a comfortable margin of 58–27, in favor of competitive interest rates and houses for veterans.

We all recognized the simple fact that veterans would not have housing if we did not permit the interest rate to rise. Investment funds have many alternatives and no sensible investor is going to put money in veterans' housing if the interest rate is artificially depressed. If the interest rate is right however, investors will come forth—and veterans will have houses.

THE FACTS OF THE MATTER

It has frequently been implied that the President's proposal would tend to increase interest rates across the board and raise the cost of borrowing for everyone. Let us look at this a minute.

The Treasury has had difficulty selling long-term 4¼-percent securities because of the current high demand for investment capital and the relatively short supply of available real savings. Thus it has been increasingly necessary to use short-term bonds in the management of the Federal debt. This injects an unfortunate measure of instability into the economy which affects every one of us.

William McChesney Martin, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, made this abundantly clear in his recent testimony before the Joint Economic Committee. Mr. Martin is a brilliant man, with whom I had the honor to serve in the last war. I remember he was the youngest man ever to be elected as president of the New York Stock Exchange. He has been Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board since long before the time when this administration came into power. Mr. Martin used the example of an individual consumer:

> The real problem on short-term versus long-term securities at the present time on financing can be put very simply. The U.S. Government is in about the same position that you would be as an individual if you had time payments coming due on an automobile, a refrigerator, and the television set, and you had a mortgage on your house that instead of being financed for 20 or 25 years was coming due every 90 days, and you had not been able to save any fat, you did not have much in the way of reserves, and then you were going to the market and saying, well, now, these notes, these charge accounts are due, and I don't have the money to pay them, but I have to borrow some more money.

In addition to the instability that this injects into the economy as a whole, the continual churning of the public debt in this manner places a heavy administrative burden on the Treasury.

The end result of the switch to short-term issues has not been a savings for the Government. On the contrary, rates on short-term Treasury bonds now exceed those on long-term bonds. This was dramatically illustrated several weeks ago when an auction of 1-year Federal obligations was won by a bidder who offered 4¾ percent—a full half point above the ceiling on long-term bonds.

I want to make one point very clear. The President's request for the removal of the long-term interest rate ceiling need not raise rates across the board. It is very likely that a moderate increase in the long-term rate would bring about a larger decline in the short-term rate, and consequently would have a generally favorable impact on the structure and level of the market for investment capital. I am of the opinion that this outcome is highly probable.

I appreciate the kindness of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], who, I am aware, disagrees with much of what I have said, for permitting me to make these observations and to put into the RECORD these views that Congress should act on President Eisenhower's request that the interest-rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds be removed. As I said when I began my remarks, I believe that these facts should be established so that the American people can better understand and judge Congress' failure to take action on this vital matter.

Mr. President, I want to comment in closing on the heartening assurances of the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee that if the House can get to work on this vital legislation, the Senate Finance Committee will remove every obstacle, so that the Senate will be able to act on such legislation before the end of the session. Knowing of the long experience and great ability in this field of both Senator BYRD of Virginia and Senator WILLIAMS of Delaware, I want to associate myself with their position. I strongly urge the other body to initiate action forthwith on the President's proposal to remove the artificial interest rate ceiling on long-term Government bonds. The American people will suffer, in my judgment, from further delay on this matter.

Mr. KEATING subsequently said: Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York for a unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I must object, relucantly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit me to yield for a minute for a unanimous-consent request, so that the Senator may make a series of brief insertions in the RECORD?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am willing to have the Senator yield, provided no insertion takes more than 1 minute.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from New York without losing my right to the floor, with the understanding the Senator from Illinois propounded, and I ask the Presiding Officer to inform me in the event the Senator from New York exceeds 1 minute, so that I can protect my rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none. and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I assure both Senators—and I appreciate their cooperation—that I will not take more than 1 minute.

Mr. President, I simply ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks with relation to interest rates an editorial from the New York Times and a column written by David Lawrence, published in the New York Herald Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorial and column were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

INVITING INFLATION

The House Ways and Means Committee acted yesterday to pigeonhole the request of President Eisenhower that it authorize him to raise the prevailing ceiling on Government bond interest rates, which are 4¼ percent in the case of marketable securities and 3.26 percent for savings bonds.

This move, which reverses the committee's approval of such a request only last week, comes not only as a complete surprise but as an extraordinary example of fiscal irresponsibility. It makes strange reading, indeed, when one considers it against the background of the general directive the committee included in last week's approval of the President's request.

"It is the sense of Congress," declared that directive, "that the Government shall take into account * * * the importance of achieving the maximum sustainable rate of economic growth, maintaining reasonable stability of the purchasing power of the dollar, and assuring that the cost of managing the public debt is kept to the minimum consistent with these vital objectives."

In the early postwar years, when the Treasury was insisting on the maintenance of "pegged" rates on Government securities, at least it confined its arguments to (1) the low cost at which the Treasury was able to raise its money, and (2) the bugaboo of a possible collapse of the Government bond market if the "peg" should be removed. Its policies were indefensible in terms of fiscal policy, but at least the Government was not hypocritical enough to argue that it was pursuing this program in the knowledge and belief that it was furthering the policy of achieving the maximum of sustainable rates of economic growth coincident with the maintenance of reasonable stability in the purchasing power of the dollar.

What yesterday's action by the Ways and Means Committee means is that, by denying the Treasury the authority to liberalize the terms under which it can raise the funds it has to raise in the months ahead through the sale of long or medium long securities, thus tapping to that extent the savings of the people, it has compelled it to raise such funds through the sale of short-term paper. Since such paper finds its way largely into the commercial banking system, it is purchased by credit created for the purpose—that is, by an inflation of the supply of credit.

NEGLECT OF INTEREST RATE IN CONGRESS CALLED MISTAKE

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, August 24.—Smoldering fires often do not attract attention whether in Government or anything else. Then when a conflagration comes those who are responsible for the neglect run to cover.

The Democratic Party today controls both Houses of Congress and is, therefore, responsible for the smoldering fire on the subject of interest rates. Despite urgent appeals from the executive branch of the Government heretofore, nothing has been done by the lawmakers to remove the ceiling that keeps the interest rates on Government bonds frozen.

This means that nobody really knows what the real rate for Government borrowing is and the consequence is a worldwide apprehension that the dollar is deteriorating.

LENDERS WON'T LEND

The answer that some Democrats make is that there has been too much talk about inflation and that the less said about it the better. Actually the lenders of money in the markets don't do much talking—they simply refuse to lend their money to the Government at existing rates. They know money should bring higher rates and they are under no compulsion to lend when they can get better rates from private borrowers.

Politically, it is supposed to be bad to allow interest rates to rise. But the fact is the politicians are driving the interest rates up artificially by refusing to let the market for Government securities find its natural level.

BLAMES FEAR OF INFLATION

Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson, in a copyrighted interview this week in U.S. News & World Report, said flatly that the fear of inflation has made the price of money go up. He declared:

"If people who have money to lend begin to worry that the dollars they are loaning out now won't be worth as much when they get them back, then they are going to ask for a higher price. They'd like a little insurance against the likelihood of an inflationary price rise, and the only way they can get it is to charge more interest. Part of the additional interest is really an insurance premium."

When asked if the removal of the ceiling as now fixed by law would cause interest rates to rise, Secretary Anderson replied:

"I do not believe that they would rise because of this recommended change in law. In the first place, while interest rates are influenced by government borrowing, interest rates in free credit markets are by no means determined by the rates we put on our new issues of securities. It's the other way around: the rates we select are determined, after considerable study and consultation, on the basis of what's been going on in the market, the rates on existing government securities, on corporate bonds, and the like. So, removing the ceiling would simply permit us to meet the market.

AID TO LOWER RATES

"Secondly, since ability to do some long-term borrowing would help hold back inflation, removal of the 4¼ percent ceiling would tend to promote lower—not higher—rates of interest. Nothing shoots up interest rates as fast as fear of inflation. That's one reason rates rose so fast in the summer of 1958. Investors are understandably reluctant to tie up their funds in long-term bonds if they believe the value of the dollar will go down. If they become convinced that we'll protect the value of the dollar, partly through sound debt management, they'll be more likely to buy long-term bonds at lower interest rates."

The Secretary thinks that continuation of the ceiling on interest rates must inevitably force the United States more and more into a controlled economy. It's the same old struggle between the believers in the law of supply and demand with a naturally operated economy and those who think the Government should manipulate money even if it has to resort to the printing press. It is the possibility that this latter kind of situation may arise which is causing widespread fears of a run on American gold by Europeans who hold vast sums of dollars on deposit in this country.

MONTHS AND NO ACTION

The problem has been before Congress for many months without any action. The results of the tragic failure to act are already emerging. Thus this week the Department of Commerce revealed that, although personal income rose in 1958, price increases wiped out the gains in purchasing power. This means further weakness in the dollar.

Many of the Democrats in Congress are actually urging that the Government peg bond prices. This has been done before and it has led to serious consequences. Marriner Eccles, who was once Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board during a Democratic administration, recently said:

"A large part of the postwar price inflation was a result of the Federal Reserve's purchasing billions of dollars of Government securities at fixed prices in order to prevent an increase in interest rates."

The whole situation is smoldering now and Democratic leaders in Congress are apparently drifting along on the mistaken theory that the interest problem can be further neglected. They never made a bigger mistake.

Mr KEATING. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from New York. The Senator from New York did a brilliant job of keeping his word. He did it, unfortunately, in far less than the allotted time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the insertion of the Senator from New York be printed at some other place in the RECORD, rather than during consideration of H.R. 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been the order.

RABBI ALEXANDER ZISSU PORTUGAL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I should like to call attention to what I consider the very fortunate outcome of something which has been troubling many of us for some time. It has to do with the arrest in Rumania last April, on suspicion of what was called treason, of Rabbi Alexander Zissu Portugal and his son.

I have just been informed by the State Department that Rabbi Portugal has been released by the Rumanian Communist Government. On a humanitarian basis, I want to express my personal gratification that this action has been taken.

The New York Times published a letter to the editor this summer, written by Reinhold Niebuhr, professor of theology, Union Theological Seminary, and Louis Finkelstein, chancellor, Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, regarding Rabbi Portugal, in which they said, in part:

A large concern for man's fate begins with empathy with one man's fate. It is this belief that we feel impelled to call attention to the tragic situation of a remarkable religious figure now under detention in Rumania, and to voice a public appeal of conscience in his behalf.

His name is Rabbi Alexander Zissu Portugal. Since April 23, when he, his son, and several friends were arrested on suspicion of treason, he has languished in prison under investigation by the Rumanian authorities, and without trial. Anyone who has ever known this dedicated man, or who has been touched by his charism, even at a distant remove, can only regard the charge against him as a tragically grievous error.

During World War II Rabbi Portugal was deported by the Nazis to Trans-Dniestria. His first act at the end of the war was to gather orphaned Jewish children and provide a home for them. When the authorities would not let him keep "his" children, he simply proceeded to make them his literally—he adopted them.

He then took a large group of the children with him to the city of Czernowitz, then under Soviet occupation. His fame as a father to children spread widely in the immediate postwar years. At one time he had as many as 40 boys and girls sharing his living quarters. At another point a group of Jewish children in a Russian orphanage in Odessa left that institution to join the rabbi in Czernowitz, as a result of which the Soviet authorities detained him for a few days.

FURTHER ARRESTS

Following this, the rabbi removed to Bucharest, where he taught the children of the Jewish orphanage. When the Rumanian authorities undertook in 1948 to dissolve this institution, the younger children especially pleaded that they be permitted to remain with the rabbi and not be transferred to the state orphan asylums. In consequence, the rabbi was once more arrested and confined for investigation for a period of 4 months.

In recent years Rabbi Portugal traveled from town to town in Rumania, visiting the Jewish communities, dispensing what alms he could gather, counseling the troubled, and himself living a life of poverty. He was twice warned that he must cease this activity and stay at home. It was after he had complied with the second warning that he was suddenly arrested last April.

This time he is far less able than before to cope with the harsh circumstances of imprisonment and investigation. He is 65, frail, and sickly; his weight has reportedly dropped to 90 pounds, in part, probably, because he has been unable in prison to obtain the kosher food which his faith enjoins upon him.

His very survival, then, may depend on his being released. And this letter is written in the prayerful hope that the Rumanian authorities, aware of the profound concern felt for Rabbi Portugal and mindful of the most elementary demands of humane charity, will be moved to release him and so to spare him the rigors which he cannot withstand in his enfeeblement and advanced years.

I realized, when this matter was brought to my attention, that it was inappropriate for our Government to make demands as to how some other sovereign government should handle its own internal affairs and the treatment of its own people. The rabbi is a Rumanian citizen, although he has been called to a synagogue in New York and, if his health permits, will, in due course, be able to take up work there.

I did, however, make several inquiries as to the rabbi's fate. It had been my plan to carry out a protest against his arrest to Mr. Khrushchev during the Communist leader's visit to the United States, but I am delighted, Mr. President, with the news that the rabbi has now been released. Free men everywhere will rejoice in this correction of a grave injustice to a great and good man.

Mr. William B. Macomber, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, has written me in part:

The Rumanian Legation in Washington has confirmed informally to the Department of State that Rabbi Portugal and his son have been released from custody by the Rumanian authorities. This information has also been confirmed by the American Legation in Bucharest.

I know other Members of the Senate are interested in the fate of this fine man, a preacher of the Bible, and I thought it was desirable to make this report at this time.

Mr. President, I am extremely grateful to my friend from Wisconsin for permitting me to intervene with these remarks.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of my good friend, the Senator from Illinois, once again to the fact that it is my position to discuss the issues, to talk on the point, and to do all I can to avoid dilatory tactics. I was sorely tempted to engage my good friend, the Senator from New York, in debate with regard to interest rates. I disagree with his position as strenuously as does my good friend, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

There is a great deal of material which I have available, if the Senator is interested in a filibuster. I have received replies from over 100 economists on this matter, some 10 or 15 pages long. I could have discussed all those. I did not do so. I did not ask the Senator from New York one question on this issue, although I feel very strongly about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator from Wisconsin very grateful to the Senator from New York for the aid which the Senator from New York has given to him in conducting this filibuster of the Lake States against the just claims of Chicago and the region south of Chicago?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Now, my good friend from Illinois knows this is not a filibuster. The Senator really knows it is not a filibuster.

The fact is that the Senator from New York made an extremely intelligent argument, an argument with which I disagree, but about as strong an argument as one could make for high interest rates. The argument was on the wrong side, but it was a compelling argument, and the Senator well argued the case.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that the prime interest rate which went into effect in New York today is the highest interest rate the country has suffered since the administration of former President Hoover?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is my understanding. It is very close to the highest interest rate we have had, I believe, in this century.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that victory bonds selling at 80 cents on the dollar today represent the lowest price for Government bonds since the depression days of the administration of former President Hoover?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Tennessee is absolutely correct.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that the high interest rate, tight money policy of this administration has brought about these results?

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is no question about it. The first and firmest and most clearcut policy of this administration has been to increase interest rates. The administration has done it persistently and with very, very little change in that attitude ever since it took office.

There was a period during 1958—and previous to that there were a few months—when the administration did not follow this restrictive policy. Actually, it is the most restrictive policy this Nation has had on interest rates in a long, long time.

I think the country should have its attention called to the fact that the administration has adopted this policy in such a way that we now have the smallest supply of money in relation to the gross national product that we have had since Andrew Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GORE. There is an article in the afternoon newspaper which indicates that President Eisenhower may summon the Congress into special session to consider the interest rate question. I think it would be a good thing to set a time aside to discuss——

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois is a very astute parliamentarian. If the Senator from Tennessee will phrase his question as an interrogatory he will protect the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator from Wisconsin agree with the junior Senator from Tennessee that it might serve the public interest, after we have had a few days with our families and our constituencies, to return to Washington, D.C., to discuss, at considerable length, the disastrous consequences of the tight money, high interest rate policy of the Government?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Indeed it would. I wish to assure my good friend from Tennessee that the very brief discussion we have had on H.R. 1 would seem brief indeed—like a 1-minute after dinner speech—compared to the length at which we intend to discuss the interest rate question if we come back. It is a very complex question. It will take the most careful consideration by the Congress. It would seem to me it would be very wise for Congress to remain in session at length, because we must call the attention of the country to the issues regarding interest rates, which are complex and are beyond the ordinary understanding of many Americans. It will take a great deal of time on the part of the Senate to call this matter properly to the attention of the country.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator agree with the junior Senator from Tennessee that as a result of this high interest rate policy the planned construction of many schools and hospitals and public projects have been postponed?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would agree with the Senator from Tennessee. The studies I have seen by the Federal Reserve Board indicate that it has two effects: No. 1, postponement; and No. 2, a perfectly fantastic increase in the cost of what the country needs the greatest.

We hear talk about inflation. The fact is that when interest rates are increased 1 percent, the effect on constructing a school, or constructing any of the facilities mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee, over a period of 30 or 40 years, is enormously increased and discouraged, as well as inflated in cost.

Mr. GORE. To what extent has this increased the cost of a home? To what extent has this increased the monthly payments of a veteran on a home which he buys under an amortized long-term credit arrangement?

Mr. PROXMIRE. It has increased the cost of a home, which would be paid for, say, over a 30-year period, if the interest is increased, say, from 4 to 5 percent, to take a simple example——

Mr. GORE. Let us go to six. We have already passed five.

Mr. PROXMIRE. From 4 percent to 6 percent the increased interest cost would obviously be a 50-percent increase in the interest cost by itself. If the interest is paid over a 30-year period, we can take that 2 percent, multiply it by 30 for 30 years, and get 60 percent. Divide that by 2, because there are diminishing balances, and we get 30 percent, and one can see that the increased interest would be 30 percent of the basic cost of the house—30 percent, or practically one-third.

This is a fantastic increase in the cost of a home to an American, and I think that there is no investment an American can make that is better or that should be more encouraged than investment in a home.

Talk about growth. If our economy should grow, I think most of us will agree that we can forgo an increase in the size of our automobiles, we can forgo some of the luxuries and some of the extravagances, but to forgo homeownership and the construction of homes for Americans is a sacrifice that is unnecessary at a time when there is substantial unemployment.

Mr. GORE. In view of the fact that most Americans buy not only homes on time, but that they also buy automobiles, refrigerators, furniture, television and radio sets, and general appliances, on the installment plan, does this policy not increase the cost of living by tremendous strides?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Very, very greatly. As a matter of fact, about 6 weeks ago, anticipating an increase in the interest rates, the National City Bank of New York—which has a different name now since the enormous mergers have taken place—the old National City Bank, announced the increase in consumer payments not only for appliances and the like, as the Senator from Tennessee has stated, but also television sets, as well as automobiles, and the increase was very substantial. It was in the neighborhood of an increase of more than 10 percent on payments for television sets, an increase of some 12 percent, as I recall, on automobiles. It was a very, very great increase, and obviously if this is not inflation, what is inflation? It is caused by high interest rates, caused by a policy which the Federal Reserve Board apologizes for by saying they want to defeat inflation.

Mr. GORE. Would not the average American think that an increase in the cost of living was inflationary?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The average American would think so, and the average American would be correct.

Mr. GORE. In view of all these facts, does the Senator find any justification whatsoever—whatsoever, I repeat—for the high interest rate, the tight money policy that is being foisted upon the American people?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I find no justification. I should like to say, however, that there are a number of economists who believe in the old Ricardian theory that the way to stop inflation is to increase the cost of money so that business will not borrow, and so that business therefore will not exert pressure on resources and labor that is in short supply.

This theory is about as antedated, is about as accurate a description of economic facts, as anything I can imagine. The fact is that this old Ricardian theory simply does not apply to them. The fact is also that by increasing the cost of money we increase the cost of everything one buys on time. We increase the cost, as the Senator from Tennessee has brought out, on homes, on schools, on automobiles, on appliances. All these are inflated in cost.

Furthermore, our experience indicates that in every hard-money period we have had, every period of rising interest rates, business has not postponed its borrowing or its investment in plant and equipment. From 1955 to 1957 the Federal Reserve Board increased rates. From 1955 to 1957 we had a fantastic expansion in business plant and equipment. It had no effect there, but it did have an effect, as the Senator from Tennessee has pointed out, in discouraging people from buying homes.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. GORE. In view of the statements made by the distinguished Senator from

New York with respect to the competition for money and the short supply of money, I should like to know if the junior Senator from Wisconsin thinks that an increase in the interest rate creates more money. Does it not in fact really increase the price people must pay for the use of money?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Exactly. What the Federal Reserve Board does is to fail to increase the supply of money as the gross national product increases, as the demand for the use of money increases, and by doing so, of course, it makes money scarcer. It raises the cost of money. That is exactly what happens, and what has happened is that the gross national product has gone up and the increase in the supply of money has gone up less rapidly, with the result that we have something like 29 percent as much money as we have a gross national product or demand for money as compared with the situation in 1946, when we had 50 percent as much money as we had gross national product or demand for money.

We are now back, as I have said before, to the situation when Andy Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury. Even at that time the increased rates were very high and the administration was not satisfied with that.

As the Senator from Tennessee has brought out so well, the fact is that increased rates are climbing ever higher.

Mr. GORE. And the administration wants to push the rate higher than it is.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Exactly, and the administration wants to come in now and say, "We will take the responsibility for this." The administration wants Congress to relinquish the one string we have for keeping interest rates on long-term bonds within the 4¼-percent limit.

Mr. GORE. Has not that limit been in effect since World War I?

Mr. PROXMIRE. It has indeed. For 40 years the Government has not had to exceed it.

Mr. GORE. Was not that ceiling in effect during World War II?

Mr. PROXMIRE. It was indeed. During that entire period we were able to fight two world wars, with a fantastic demand for capital by the Government, and a fantastic demand for the savings of our people, without exceeding 4¼ percent.

Mr. GORE. Was it not sufficient to finance the requirements of the Korean conflict?

Mr. PROXMIRE. It was indeed.

Mr. GORE. Why, then, in a peacetime economy, does this administration find it impossible to manage the public debt within a ceiling that has been applicable and that has worked well for all these many years and through these emergencies?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Because this administration has a theory, and that theory, putting the best possible light on it, is that the way to keep prices from going up is to make money precious and scarce; that if they do that, people will not borrow; if people will not borrow, they will not spend; and if people will not spend, demand will be discouraged; and if demand is discouraged, prices will go down.

The Senator from Tennessee knows perfectly well, as does the Senator from Wisconsin, that we have an entirely different reason for inflation. Inflation has been caused very largely, on the basis of the most comprehensive studies, in part, perhaps, by demand, but not at this time, and not for the last 4 or 5 years. It has been caused largely by the power of a number of industries, particularly steel and insurance and tobacco and a number of others, to unilaterally increase their prices without regard for demand. They increase prices whether demand falls off or not. The best example is that last year, when demand began falling off to the point where United States Steel was operating at 50-percent capacity, prices went up. According to all Ricardian laws, prices should have gone down, but they went up.

Mr. GORE. If this theory, which, as the Senator has said, has already been proved by experience to be fallacious, were true, why is it that the cost of living has continued to go up and up and up, while interest rates have likewise continued to go up and up and up?

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is an excellent question. It seems to me that it draws attention to the principal experience which every American can taste, feel, and smell. He knows from his own experience that today when he goes out to buy he must pay more. He also knows that the administration has followed a policy of driving interest rates up. The fact is that a couple of months ago—I believe in April—it was announced that the cost of living had gone up. There was one reason why it had gone up. It is very interesting to me. The reason it had gone up was that State and local taxes had increased.

Why have State and local taxes gone up? Because State and local governments found they had to pay more for capital improvements. They had to pay more for money, in order to finance capital improvements. They had to pay more for their bond issues, to build streets, schools, hospitals, and so forth. The only way they could get the money was by increasing taxes, and that increased the cost of living. That was said to be the principal factor in increasing the cost of living.

Mr. GORE. What good national purpose, then, would be served by the enactment of a law removing all ceilings from interest rates?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am sure the administration is perfectly sincere in saying that the national purpose that would be served, as the Senator from New York has said, is that the Federal Government could then get into the competitive market and sell its long-term bonds in competition with private bonds, and could put the debt on a long-term basis instead of a short-term basis.

There is a very long answer to that, in part constituted by the fact that for years the administration had every opportunity to do this. It has rarely done it. We have had periods of as much as 18 months when the Federal Government has not tried to sell long-term bonds. Again it has reached the point where it can do so, at great cost to the taxpayer, and put him in a position where he will have to pay 5 or 6 percent interest for many years, because the bonds are long-term bonds. Now the administration says it wants this power. It is a fantastic request, and it seems to me, on the basis of inflation theory, on the basis of any kind of assumption one wishes to make, we can show that the policy is unwise, and that the power asked for should not be granted.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. How is it possible to build the country and expand the economy on high interest rates?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The question of the Senator from Mississippi is an excellent question, because the fact is that the country cannot be built on high interest rates.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is it not true that the greatest industrial expansion in the history of the world was the industrial expansion of the United States built on low-interest rates?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi is absolutely correct. When the Democratic administration took over in 1933 one of the first things it did was to adopt a low-interest-rate policy. Every American will recall the enormous expansion of the country's industrial power, its homes, and the opportunity for the people to grow and develop.

Mr. EASTLAND. And the added happiness of its people.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is it not a fact that for many generations under Republican administrations, when there have been high interest rates and special privileges to New York bankers, our development and progress have been stifled and held down?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi is 100 percent correct. The fact is that this is what interest rates do: They are, in effect, price supports for bankers. As a matter of fact, they are prices for bankers, as the Senator from Illinois has pointed out.

Mr. EASTLAND. They are subsidies for bankers.

Mr. PROXMIRE. They are subsidies for bankers, at the expense of every American who must borrow money to finance the purchase of a home, a farm, an automobile, or any other commodity which costs more than $100.

Mr. EASTLAND. It is enrichment of the few at the expense of the many.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Absolutely.

Mr. EASTLAND. That is sound Republican doctrine, is it not?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi is absolutely correct. It is enrichment of the few at the expense of the many, because the Federal Reserve Board has shown that some 10 percent of the people own two-thirds of the wealth. This means that when interest rates are increased, people who owe money and who pay interest—and that constitutes, of course, the great majority of the American people—have to pay that interest to the people who have two-thirds of the wealth. There is a transfer of income, a transfer of wealth, in the simplest terms, as the Senator from Mississippi has so eloquently stated.

Mr. EASTLAND. It is a transfer of wealth by law.

Mr. PROXMIRE. A transfer of wealth by law.

Mr. EASTLAND. And by the policy of the U.S. Government.

Mr. PROXMIRE. By the policy of the Republican administration. I earnestly hope that it will not be the policy of the Democratic Congress.

Mr. EASTLAND. Nor of the next Democratic administration, 2 years from now.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Nor of the next Democratic administration, which will take office in 2 years.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator feel that he owes to the junior Senator from New York a debt of gratitude for being the catalyst to bring together the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Mississippi, who so often find themselves at variance? They have been brought together on this issue.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from New York is a very astute gentleman. I call his attention to the fact that he and I are working together in behalf of House bill 1, which is the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. KEATING. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I do not believe the Senator from New York wishes to provoke any differences among Senators. I am very happy to associate myself with the distinguished Senator from Mississippi on this issue. We agree on a number of things. We may disagree on some things, but he has excellent judgment in the area of monetary management. I agree with him.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. The Senator knows that high interest rates will break any business. High interest rates will enslave any people. That, fundamentally, is the issue.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi is correct. High interest rates will break any business that is in a position where it must borrow money, which means that they will not break most banks, the big bankers, the Wall Street bankers. They will not break large industries.

Mr. EASTLAND. They will break country banks.

Mr. PROXMIRE. They will not break enormous steel companies, which are in a position to finance their own growth through raising the prices of steel. Small business, farmers, and those who have to borrow money to keep alive can be broken.

Mr. EASTLAND. The small banks can be broken.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The small banks can be broken.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that thousands of small banks would now be bankrupt if they listed their portfolios of Government bonds at market prices?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Tennessee makes an excellent point. A few weeks ago I received a letter from a country banker in Waukesha, Wis., who owns and operates a small bank. That is exactly his position. He feels that it would be a great mistake for us to increase the interest rate on long-term bonds. He feels that it would be a great mistake for Congress to do anything that would increase interest rates and greatly diminish the value of his portfolio. He would be placed in a position where, if he had to liquidate, he would have to do so at a great loss.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. The distinguished Senator knows that the average bank makes a loan on a given price level for land or for personal property; and when the policies of the Government force that price level down, it means that the security is not worth the amount which the bank has loaned. It further means that with high-interest rates, when prices go down, the farmer, the small businessman, and the workingman cannot pay the high interest, and the debt must be liquidated on the basis of low prices. It ends by being a bankrupt lending institution. That is true of every small bank in the Nation.

The greatest thing Franklin Roosevelt accomplished when he was President of the United States was to break the stranglehold of Wall Street on the money market of the Nation. The Eisenhower administration has put us under the yoke of Wall Street once again.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Mississippi. That was an excellent statement. I agree with it. I am delighted he brought out that point.

What is happening to the farmer today is what happened to him under the previous Republican administrations from 1920 to 1932. As his prices went down, his costs went up. The farmer has to borrow money with which to finance his crop, to buy land, to buy stock, to buy implements. The farmer is one of the most important debtors in the Nation. Of course, it becomes extremely difficult for him to pay the interest and to pay off the principal of his loan.

As the Senator from Mississippi pointed out so well, because the small banks have farmers and small businessmen as their customers, it means that farmers and small businessmen are in a position where it is extremely difficult for them to pay their loans themselves, and this constitutes a real loss to the small bankers.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. EASTLAND. Does the Senator from Wisconsin recall that before the administration of Franklin Roosevelt, in the great days of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, days of disaster, the strongest, most powerful, and most influential people in the country were J. P. Morgan and three or four other great Wall Street banking houses?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi is correct. I should say in all honesty that I used to work for J. P. Morgan & Co., away back in 1940 or 1941. They are fine people to work for. They are good Americans. They are decent people. But I think their policies, or the policies they seem to favor, are not necessarily the policies which the Federal Government should adopt. I think that in many cases their influence and the policies they have favored have been damaging to small business and to farmers.

Mr. EASTLAND. In 1940 and 1941 their influence was on the decline, but the Senator knows that high interest rates and their control of the finance of this country brought on the great depression and critically injured millions of American citizens.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Mississippi makes an excellent point. There is no question that the tendency of Republican administrations to be influenced in the interest of big financiers and of Wall Street was really a factor in causing the depression. I say that, recognizing once again that the Wall Street bankers serve a tremendously useful, important, and economic purpose in this country. They are men of great ability as well as of good character. But we can go too far in that direction, as we can go too far in any other direction, in giving any kind of great economic power and dominance such as was held by the Republican administrations before Franklin Roosevelt.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I ask the Senator if he shares the confusion of the junior Senator from New York over the very strong, ardent speech of the Senator from Mississippi in support of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Did it come as a surprise to the Senator from Wisconsin to hear what the Senator from Mississippi said?

Mr. PROXMIRE. No, it did not come as a surprise to me. I know that the Senator from Mississippi has supported Franklin D. Roosevelt. The Senator is a good Democrat.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. EASTLAND. I voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt every time he ran for President. Would the Senator from Wisconsin please ask the Senator from New York how many times the Senator from New York voted for Franklin Roosevelt?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask the distinguished Republican junior Senator from New York how many times he voted for Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to respond to that question. While I had great respect for President Roosevelt and his office after he was elected, I never voted for him for President or for Governor of New York.

I must say, in answer to the Senator's inquiry, that I was quite surprised to hear the statement of the Senator from Mississippi. I would not want to reveal any confidences, but I am sure I have heard the Senator from Mississippi criticize many of the policies advocated by President Roosevelt. I was much surprised to hear this enthusiastic embrasure by the Senator from Mississippi of the views and principles of President Roosevelt. It may be of interest in connection with other issues, although I must in all fairness say that the Senator from Mississippi has not at any time said he saw eye to eye with President Roosevelt.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I want to be sure the Senator has asked a question. I want to protect my right to the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. KEATING. Which Senator?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from New York is out of order. He did not ask a question; he made a statement, contrary to the rules of the Senate. I make the point of order that the Senator from New York is out of order, and that the Senator from Wisconsin has lost his right to the floor.

Mr. KEATING. I point out that I was answering a question put to me by the Senator from Wisconsin without any objection, and asked at the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I make the further point of order that the junior Senator from New York is not asking a question but is making a statement. I ask that he be compelled to take his seat. I further ask that the Senator from Wisconsin be deprived of his right to the floor.

Mr. KEATING. I am speaking to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senators please suspend until the Chair rules on the point of order? The Chair hopes that Senators will bear with him while he is briefed by the Parliamentarian on this subject.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in order to avoid delay, I will withdraw my amendment and offer another amendment. I ask that the clerk read my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I will yield after the clerk reads the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to strike out "one hundred and seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and eighty-five."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is not a frivolous amendment?

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is not a frivolous amendment, as the Senator from Illinois has suggested. I was deeply concerned about the fact that the study of the currents of Lake Michigan extended only up to a little below Kewaunee, Wis. I was concerned with how it would affect Kewaunee and Algoma. Therefore, I said I was interested in an amendment which would extend the distance to 180 or 185 miles. I also have amendments which would extend the distance to 190, 195, and 200 miles, respectively. I do not want to be dilatory about them, but I believe this to be a matter of concern to me. I am trying to get the best information I can from my State in order to determine at what distance they wish the study to be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] agreed to accept the Senator's amendment to provide for 180 miles; and is it not true that the Senator from Wisconsin refused to put his own amendment into effect? If, as I think, I can persuade the Senator from Oklahoma to accept the present amendment, will the Senator from Wisconsin stand by his amendment and begin to discuss the issue, instead of indulging in this shadowboxing and these delaying tactics on the floor of the Senate? Is it not true that the Senator from Wisconsin is making a mockery of the legislative process?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois could not be more wrong. I spoke to the point all day. The only time I departed from the point was when the proponents of the bill, including the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] both of whom voted for the bill, asked me a series of questions on interest rates. Except for that, I have been speaking right to the point of the bill all day long. I have done my best to talk to the very point with which the Senate has said it is concerned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin reply to my question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would reply to the question of the Senator from Illinois by saying that if the Senator from Oklahoma is interested in accepting my amendment, after I have had a chance to explain the amendment and after I have had a chance to speak twice on my amendment, I would certainly be glad to have him accept it.

But, Mr. President, I also wish to have the parliamentary opportunity to speak in this Chamber without having this expert parliamentarian take me off my feet. The Senator from Illinois knows perfectly well that all he has to do is object whenever a Senator who asks me to yield fails to ask a question in precisely the form of an interrogatory. If a Senator who asks me to yield fails to place the verb before the pronoun or the noun, the Senator from Illinois can rise and can state, "I object"; and if his objection is sustained, I will be required to take my seat; and if that happens twice, I will be through.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am taking advantage of my own parliamentary rights; and I point out to the Senator from Illinois that I have not started my speech; I have not had a chance to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is not in order, inasmuch as he is not in his seat or at his desk; instead, he is wandering all over the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President——

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, after I yield to the Senator from Louisiana, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois for a question—when he has returned to his seat and has gotten behind his desk, and is in order. [Laughter.]

I yield now to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, in view of the national and the international implications of this measure, would it be fair to the other Members of the Senate to permit this amendment to be voted on before the entire Senate had an opportunity to understand what the amendment is?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Of course not; and I think the Senator from Louisiana is entirely correct in suggesting that the amendment should be fully understood by all Members of the Senate. Much as I would like to have my amendment adopted, I would not want the Senate to take hasty action on it. [Laughter.] The fact is that not all of the 100 Members of the Senate are in the Chamber—although they should be here—to hear our discussion of this amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a further question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Does the thought occur to the Senator from Wisconsin that although it might be agreeable to the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois to have the study conducted in regard to the effect of currents and flows of water throughout the south 180 miles of Lake Michigan, a majority of the Members of the Senate might have objection to such a provision, after they heard it discussed?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Louisiana is correct; and certainly I believe that only one or two Senators should not proceed to make arrangements for the adoption of amendments which might be the subject of serious objection by a majority of the Members of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Has the Senator from Wisconsin noticed the shining eyes of admiration which have been leveled at him by our friends from south of the Mason-Dixon line? Is the Senator from Wisconsin aware that from time to time I have heard comments that they would like to sign him up on their team? [Laughter.]

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, coming from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], who has admitted that he spoke three consecutive days on the natural gas bill, and that he and his colleagues held the floor for more than a month, on that bill—in fact, for approximately 6 weeks, I believe—this is, indeed, a high compliment. [Laughter.]

I may also say to the Senator from Illinois that this is one of the most extraordinary debates, because the Senator from Illinois has refused to answer questions in regard to the merits of the bill. I have repeatedly asked him to defend his position vis-a-vis that of the Supreme Court and that of various agencies and Members; but the Senator from Illinois has risen only to denounce the Senator from Wisconsin for conducting a filibuster—although the Senator from Illinois knows that such a denunciation is not an argument on the merits of the pending measure and has nothing to do with the merits of the bill.

If the Senator from Illinois had paid as much attention to considering the merits of this amendment as he has paid in connection with his determination not to discuss the merits of the pending measure, he might have more chance of attracting to his side of the issue more Senators, instead of having the Senate prepare to vote, on tomorrow, to refer the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, earlier in the day I said that when I had an opportunity to do so, I would call the attention of the Senate to the extremely important treaty of 1909. In the majority report itself we find the statement by Canada that in her judgment that solemn treaty would be violated if the United States were to take unilateral action in connection with this matter.

Furthermore, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] brought out very eloquently, during the debate, that Canada had stated, in a letter from her Ambassador to our then Acting Secretary of State:

> I am instructed, therefore, to express the hope of the Government of Canada that the United States will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes Basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

In other words, Canada is convinced that this bill would constitute a violation of that treaty; and Canada has used the strongest possible diplomatic language to call that point to our attention.

Mr. President, at this time I should like to refer to a memorandum which I have had prepared in regard to this issue. The memorandum shows that not only should this position on the part of Canada be considered by our experts in this field—namely, our Committee on Foreign Relations—and that careful consideration should be given to Canada's claim, even if she were wrong about it, but that, as a matter of fact, it is particularly important for this point to be very carefully considered, in view of the fact that we clearly believe that Canada is correct.

I read now from the memorandum:

> The following questions have been raised during debate on the bill:
> (1) Does the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty with Great Britain (for Canada) apply to Lake Michigan?
> (2) If the treaty applies to Lake Michigan, why has the International Joint Commission, established by the treaty, taken no action with respect to the diversion of waters from the lake?
> (3) Why has the matter not been referred to the Commission?
> I
> It is absolutely clear that the 1909 treaty does apply to the waters of Lake Michigan, whether or not the lake is a boundary water.

Incidentally, Mr. President, I should like to say that this is the key issue, insofar as many Senators are concerned. I have heard some of the most distinguished Members of this body who favor this bill say that Lake Michigan is an American lake, and therefore is completely outside the jurisdiction of any international agreement with Canada. But I submit that Lake Michigan is a boundary water; and the treaty could hardly be more explicit with regard to boundary water.

I read further from the memorandum:

> It may plausibly be argued that Lake Michigan is not a boundary water because it is entirely within the United States. However, geologists and engineers consider Lake Michigan and Lake Huron as one lake. There is no natural division between them, and whatever affects one necessarily and promptly affects the other. The two lakes—if considered as such—have the same level.

Mr. President, because my good friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], is being so stringent a parliamentarian, it will be impossible for me to walk over to the map in the rear of the Chamber and demonstrate on the map the fact that Lake Michigan and Lake Huron are but one lake. It will be impossible for me to proceed to the map to do that, because if I were to do so, I realize that my good friend, the Senator from Illinois, would object, and would say I was in violation of the rule, because I was not standing at my desk.

But I shall point to the map, and shall stress the point that Lake Michigan-Lake Huron have a very broad connection, as shown on the map. It is not a narrow channel; it is a broad body of water. At that point the waters intermingle, and there is but one lake. In fact, all the charts show that Lake Michigan-Huron is considered to be but one lake. Lake Superior is considered to be a separate lake. Lake Erie is also considered to be a separate lake. So is Lake Ontario. But all the charts show the name "Lake Michigan-Lake Huron"; that is shown in several places on the charts.

Mr. President, I now read further from the memorandum:

> However, for the purpose of determining whether the 1909 treaty applies to Lake Michigan, it makes no difference whether Lake Michigan-Huron is one lake or two.
> If Michigan-Huron is one lake, it is of course a boundary water as defined in the preliminary article of the treaty (R. 204) and is governed by articles III and VIII (R. 205–206, 207).

Mr. President, as I have said, even the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] must consider it as one lake. He has told the Senate, by means of the use of sign language that is clearly to be understood, that Lake Michigan-Huron is treated as one lake.

If the Senator from Illinois wishes to rely on semantics and to say that, somehow, up to a certain point, the water is Lake Michigan, and a little farther along it becomes Lake Huron, of course he is entitled to do so.

But the fact is, on the basis of any commonsense definition, that both Lake Michigan and Lake Huron seem to be a single body of water, as the Senator from Illinois has very properly treated them by means of his charts.

However, Mr. President, let us assume for the moment that the worst possible view of this matter were the correct one—namely, that Lake Michigan is one lake and Lake Huron is a separate lake. In that event, if it be true that they are two different lakes, then Lake Michigan is a tributary water—

> Water on [our] own side of the line which in [its] natural channel would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters.

That is article II, R. 205.

With respect to such waters, the treaty provides that any interference with or diversion thereof by the United States or Canada "shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where the diversion or interference occurs."

That is article II, R. 205.

That could hardly be clearer, Mr. President. The treaty provides that any interference with or diversion thereof by the United States or Canada "shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where the diversion or interference occurs."

This is why Canada looks at Lakes Michigan and Huron and says, "Even if you think they are not the same lake, the fact is that everybody knows, who has ever visited this part of the Middle West, that Lake Michigan flows into Lake Huron. They know Lake Michigan, on the basis of any definition, is a tributary of Lake Huron. The treaty specifically treats of that tributary, and therefore to take water out of Lake Michigan prevents it from going into Lake Huron."

Continuing with the provisions: the two Nations expressly reserved to themselves the right to object to any interference with or diversion of such tributary waters which would produce material injury to navigation on its side of the boundary.

That is article II, R. 205.

This is precisely what Canada has done. It states, in its notes of protest to the United States of April 9 and August 20 of this year—as in earlier protests—that the diversion contemplated by this bill would produce material injury to Canada.

Mr. President, at this point I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry, because I understand I may have been mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is there a rule of the Senate that a Senator is not in order if he speaks from a place other than behind his desk or if he walks away from his desk? Is he out of order at that time, and is it proper to say that he is out of order and to take him off the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised there is no rule in the Senate on that subject.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In other words, a Senator can speak from anywhere on the floor, he can walk to and look at a map, and he can stroll, and cannot be said to be out of order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules of the Senate do not speak on that point.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a parliamentary inquiry, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Do not the rules clearly state that a Senator shall speak from his desk?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will read rule XIX (1):

> When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer, and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

There is no reference in the language which has been read or in the remainder of rule XIX which is to the effect that a Senator must speak from his desk.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If I understand the ruling of the Chair, it is that a Senator is free to walk to the map to make his point, and if an objection is made, he cannot be called out of order and he will not be taken off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing in the rules that requires a Senator to speak from behind his desk.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Wisconsin asks specifically of the Presiding Officer, in the event the Senator from Wisconsin should move away from his desk, specifically, to the map at the rear of the room, and in the event that at that point another Senator should make the point of order that the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order because he is not speaking from his desk, or because he has walked away from his desk while he is talking, and that therefore the Senator from Wisconsin should take his seat, will the Senator from Wisconsin be compelled to give up and lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule that if the Senator from Wisconsin should find it expedient, in order to make his point, to go to the map, he would not lose the floor as a result of that act.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Maine, and also I thank the Presiding Officer, who is also the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE].

Mr. President, I want to make clear the point I just made in this very important matter with regard to the treaty rights of Canada. I want to repeat the last paragraph:

The two nations expressly reserved to themselves the right to object to any interference with or diversion of such tributary waters which would produce material injury to navigation on its side of the boundary.

That is article II, R. 205.

This is precisely what Canada has done. It states, in its notes of protest to the United States of April 9 and August 20 of this year—which Senators have had before them since the debate started—as in earlier protests, that the diversion contemplated by the bill would produce material injury to Canada.

Let me repeat that: The two nations expressly reserved to themselves the right to object to any interference with or diversion of such tributary waters which would produce material injury to navigation on its side of the boundary.

That is article II, R. 205.

As I have said, this is precisely what Canada has done. It has done all it can, under the treaty; and the Senate of the United States, if it passes this bill, will be flaunting the bill at Canada, and will be enacting legislation which Canada has specifically objected to, and rightly objected to, on the basis of the treaty.

I submit that, although the Senator from Illinois has vehemently protested our explanation of the bill and has condemned us for filibustering, he has failed to answer this question. He has failed to make any case except what he put in the RECORD, which we discussed and pointed out as not being pertinent. He has failed to make any case against the position that Canada has a right to make this protest.

The International Joint Commission has not acted on diversion from Lake Michigan because the matter has not been referred to it. It has no power to undertake an investigation on its own initiative.

Under article VIII of the treaty, the Commission has jurisdiction to pass upon the question of diversion from Lake Michigan if it is a boundary water. The Commission would have power to prohibit the diversion, under article III.

If Lake Michigan is not a boundary water, either Government could nevertheless submit the question to the International Joint Commission under article IX of the treaty. In that case, however, the Commission could not make a final decision, but would merely report on the facts and the law, and it would be up to the two Governments to accept or reject the decision.

Does not that seem to be a perfectly fair, proper, and logical way to proceed?

After all, we have set up the International Joint Commission. We have our representatives on the Commission. We have an equal number of representatives. We are not bound to accept their recommendations. At least we should give them the right to speak out on the matter. It seems to me this is the kind of question as to which an inquiry should be made by the Committee on Foreign Relations before the Senate passes the bill.

Mr. President, under article VIII of the treaty, the Commission has jurisdiction to pass upon the question of diversion from Lake Michigan, if it is a boundary water.

I should like to repeat that, because it is extremely important.

Under article VIII of the treaty, the Commission has jurisdiction to pass upon the question of diversion from Lake Michigan if it is a boundary water. The Commission would have power to prohibit the diversion, under article III.

If Lake Michigan is not a boundary water, either Government could nevertheless submit the question to the International Joint Commission under article IX of the treaty. In that case, however, the Commission could not make a final decision, but would merely report on the facts and the law, and it would be up to the two Governments to accept or reject the decision.

In this connection our State Department's legal adviser said, with respect to the proposed diversion by Canada of the upper waters of the Columbia River:

> 3. (a) A riparian (nation) which proposes to make, or allow, a change in the existing regime of a system of international waters which could interfere with the realization by a coriparian of its right to share on a just and reasonable basis in the use and benefits of the system, is under a duty to give the coriparian an opportunity to object.

This is exactly what we are pleading for. This is why we want to send the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to consider exactly that kind of a right, which the State Department's legal adviser, a competent authority, says Canada should have.

> (b) If the coriparian, in good faith, objects and demonstrates its willingness to reach a prompt and just solution by the pacific means envisaged in article 33(1) of the Charter of the United Nations, a riparian is under a duty to refrain from making, or allowing, such change, pending agreement or other solution (1958 hearings, p. 289).

Neither the United States nor Canada has referred the question of additional diversion at Chicago to the International Joint Commission. Since both Governments have taken the position that such diversion would be undesirable, there has been no dispute to submit.

If either Government were in doubt as to the facts, or if further study were necessary or useful, the International Joint Commission would, of course, be obliged to undertake such a study and make recommendations upon the request of either Government.

Certainly it would be more in line with the principles and practice of international law to request such a study by the International Joint Commission, before diversion, than for the United States to order the study to be carried out by a domestic agency, and at the same time and by the same law authorize the commencement of additional diversion. Such unilateral action would violate the clear intent of the 1909 treaty.

Mr. President, I submit that this position, in view of the attitude of Canada, in view of the very vigorous Canadian protest, is unanswerable. I have challenged the proponents of the bill to answer the argument. They have had ample opportunity. They have accused us of filibustering, but they have not answered that vital point.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that this year—as a matter of fact, June 28 of this year—there was a U.S. delegation to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. Attending that meeting were the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], as chairman, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BARTLETT], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

In the course of this meeting an agreement was made, which is stated on page 7 of the document entitled "Report of the Second Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, June 25–28, 1959," held at Montreal and Ottawa, Canada, Union Calendar No. 317, House Report No. 730, 86th Congress, 1st session:

> The group agreed that unilateral action should not be taken in legislative or administrative matters affecting the interests of both countries without entering into discussions aimed at reconciling divergent views.

Mr. President, what does that language mean if it does not mean that the United States should not take unilateral action, or any action, even, if we were convinced that Canada had expressed an interest? What does the language mean if it does not mean that Canada, if Canada felt we were wrong, should have a right to be consulted and should have a right to be listened to?

This is all that Canada asks for. Its notes are extremely emphatic.

As the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] pointed out, the language is extraordinarily strong, yet the Senate of the United States is refusing to even let the Committee on Foreign Relations look into the matter. Some Senators are saying, "After all, Lake Michigan is one lake, which is separate from Lake Huron. Lake Huron is the only boundary water."

The fact is that every authority, including the Senator from Illinois, views Lake Michigan and Lake Huron together as one lake. It so says at the chart. In fact, if they are two lakes, Lake Michigan can only be a tributary of Lake Huron. If Lake Michigan is a tributary of Lake Huron, it is covered by the 1909 treaty. If Lake Michigan is covered by the 1909 treaty, it would be against the explicit provisions of the treaty to increase the diversion of water unilaterally without consultation with Canada.

This is the reasonable position which Canada has taken. Whether the position is reasonable or unreasonable, Canada certainly has a right to its day in court before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, I should like to read a little more from this very interesting report of the second meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, also at page 7:

> A presentation was made to the section on the problem of the Chicago diversion and the group expressed its hope that consultation between the United States and Canada on this subject might lead to constructive proposals. The group recommended that the steering committee of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group collect all existing reports, studies, and other data relating to problems of pollution, recreation, conservation, power utilization, industrial development, port facilities, and navigation in the Great Lakes area. It was recommended to the steering committee that it review and evaluate this material looking toward the making of further suggestions at the next meeting of the steering committee.

Mr. President, if this group is to act in good faith and in justice to our good neighbor Canada, it seems that we can hardly act on a matter which they consider unilateral, which obviously affects the Great Lakes, which we said we wanted to work out on a cooperative basis, without directly insulting them and affronting an agreement our own Senators made in good faith with Canada just a little more than 2 months ago.

Mr. President, possibly at a later date, before we vote on sending the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee, there is more material that should be called to the attention of the Senate. I realize that the hour is late and that really it is about time that I started on the main portion of my statement, because so far I have been talking in answer to the brilliant statement made by the Senator from Illinois this morning. I thought in fairness to the other Senators that it was necessary first to discuss his speech in detail. I have spent the day so far in discussing the very excellent statement the Senator from Illinois made, discussed it line by line, and I do hope that tomorrow he will reply to the remarks made today, so that we can carry on tomorrow in the same vein and enlighten the Senate on both viewpoints, so that we can have a balanced presentation and understand fully the positions of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin. Then Senators can make up their minds based on having heard both sides of the case.

Mr. President, I return to the bill itself and to the first amendment to the bill.

My amendment which is pending, to insert 185 miles instead of 175 miles, relates to the first amendment. The amendment starts:

> The studies described above shall include, but not be limited to, the effect of the diversion of an additional one thousand cubic feet per second on the levels of the Great Lakes, and shall also include a study of the effect of currents and flows of water throughout the south one hundred and seventy-five miles of Lake Michigan—

The amendment would provide for 185 miles. I initially had offered an amendment to provide 180 miles. I withdrew that for two reasons: first, a parliamentary reason; second, a substantive reason.

The parliamentary reason was that the Senator from Illinois was in a position, with his very acute and alert parliamentary sense and his tremendous concentration on what various Senators were saying, to take the Senator from Wisconsin possibly off his feet. So in order to protect myself I offered another amendment, which also had substantial merit, and which I think was an improvement on the other.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin realize that I can guarantee that we will accept this second amendment if the Senator from Wisconsin will only get into a discussion of this measure instead of resorting to these delaying tactics?

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Illinois knows perfectly well that all day long we have been talking about the merits of this case. He knows that the only time, with a few exceptions of discussion on interest rates, raised by proponents of the bill, largely, the only time we have departed from the merits of the bill is when the Senator from Illinois has arisen, as he does periodically about every hour, to give a dissertation on filibustering, a very interesting subject, one which I think we could discuss profitably at great length. I have a 300-page book on it, and I think perhaps we should discuss it, but I want to speak to the point at issue. I do not want the Senator from Illinois to divert me from that point by challenging me to discuss the merits of the filibuster.

I agree that his speech of 3 days, which he delivered some time ago, and the speech of his colleagues of some 6 weeks on the gas bill, were justified, and were not in violation of a procedure against filibuster. I think the Senator from Illinois knows perfectly well that his proposal, for which I voted enthusiastically, which certainly was the most important procedural amendment that faced this Congress, which we were called upon to vote upon when we first arrived here in January, was an excellent proposal. I enthusiastically supported it. That proposal, as the Senator from Illinois emphatically stated, would not have cut off debate, would not have gagged debate, would not have ended debate. It would not have prevented Senators from explaining their position in detail. It would have permitted 2 full months of debate.

The Senator from Illinois took the position it would end the filibuster. I would have agreed with the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Illinois knows that we have not taken 2 months. It is true that the bill has been before the Senate for a week now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that it has seemed like 2 years while the Senator was speaking?

Mr. PROXMIRE. To the Senator from Illinois perhaps it may have seemed quite a while. I think that the reason for that is psychologically very interesting. The Senator from Illinois loves a good fight. He loves a debate. He is extremely effective in it. It does not become his nature to have to sit silently by and sniff the flowers as the Ferdinand he chooses to be. He would much prefer, I am sure, to charge in and take on the picadors and matadors and blunt their instruments. He is willing to shed blood, but somehow he is insisting on not enlightening the Senate with his own viewpoint.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wonder if the able Senator would yield to me so that I may make a brief statement with no one being harmed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of my good friend from Illinois that his objections have prolonged the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has been trying desperately to get into his speech, and every time the Senator from Wisconsin is about to do it, the Senator from Illinois rises like Old Faithful every 45 minutes and gushes up and says he objects, that we are filibustering, and then we engage in a 5- or 10-minute discussion as to whether or not it is a filibuster. In the meantime, distinguished Senators like the Senator from California could have put into the RECORD whatever they wished to insert. The Senate could have proceeded on its way. No time would have been consumed. The Senator from Illinois has been so strict in enforcing the rules that I am afraid he has delayed the Senate in considering this very important matter.

I see the Senator shaking his head. Would he care to reply? Apparently not.

Mr. President, to return to the committee amendment, I have two other amendments I should like to offer that bear on the committee amendment. I am going to offer these amendments now and very briefly explain them, too. I should like to discuss them in detail when I call them up.

The first amendment provides, on page 3, lines 21, 22, and 23, for striking out "of currents and flows of water throughout the south one hundred and seventy-five miles of" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "of experimentally returning substantial quantities of completely treated sewage treatment plant effluent to."

Mr. President, in explanation of this amendment, the proponents of the bill have shown an astonishing lack of confidence in what they term theoretical studies of the effect of diversion even in the face of unanimous agreement by the experts as to the validity and accuracy of such studies. Nevertheless, when they inserted the amendment asking for a study of "currents and flows of the water throughout the south 175 miles of Lake Michigan," they were expressing their willingness to accept extraordinary extrapolation of data of theoretical nature.

Presumably the purpose of such a study would be to determine the feasibility of returning all or a portion of the Chicago sewage treatment plant effluent to Lake Michigan. There is no apparent or simple correlation between flows and currents and the probability or improbability of pollution by returning treated effluent to the lake. Many variables are involved such as the temperature extent of treatment, the distance offshore and depth of discharge of the effluent, the method of injection in addition to the currents. Yet the proponents of the 1-year diversion study ask that the feasibility of returning effluent to Lake Michigan be based on a partial evaluation of only one variable; namely, surface currents.

This is a very serious amendment. I believe this current study makes sense, but I think it cannot make sense unless it has some practical basis; and it will not have a practical basis unless some of the effluent is discharged into Lake Michigan, so that it can be studied.

There is no question that the Senator from Illinois will rise in horror and say that we are polluting Lake Michigan. The fact is that every Great Lakes city except Chicago returns to Lake Michigan its treated sewage. No health problem is charged, except by the Senator from Illinois. We believe that this practical study makes sense; and it makes sense for another reason.

The objection by Canada is that the water of Lake Michigan will be diminished by diverting it into the Mississippi River out of the Great Lakes watershed. If an ample amount of the treated sewage is returned, there can be additional diversion to improve the quality of the water of the Illinois Waterway, and enough could be returned to the lake to compensate for that diversion, and to test the effect of currents on improving the quality of water that is put into Lake Michigan. That is the only way to test the effect sensibly.

Mr. President, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the event I should present this amendment now, to be called up later, would I thereby lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is another amendment pending.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I recognize that. In the event that I ask that this amendment lie on the table and be printed, so that it can be available to Senators tomorrow for their consideration, may I do so without asking unanimous consent, or without losing my right to the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be in order.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Very well, Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have just described be printed and lie on the table, so that I can call it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I now come to the second amendment I have, which pertains to the same committee amendment which is now pending before the Senate. My second amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 21, after the word "Lakes", to insert the words "and the effect of such diversion on the flows in the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers."

This amendment is offered to clarify the scope of the study, since the downstream riparian owners are just as interested in the quantity of water flowing in the rivers as they are in the level of the water surface of the lakes. In fact, the production of hydroelectric power at Niagara Falls, Massena, and Beauharnois will be affected primarily by the fact that the actual volume of water which would be available to run through the turbines would be reduced by the proposed diversion. Power production by hydroelectric plants depends upon the product of two factors, head times flow. While the drop in water level would not appreciably reduce production of power, the reduction in flow certainly would be appreciable and in direct proportion to the quantity of water which Chicago diverts. The advocates of H.R. 1 have consistently ignored this fact and the above amendment is vital if the study proposed is to be at all realistic of the total loss involved.

I believe anyone can see that this is a very serious amendment. It makes all the sense in the world to give full economic consideration to the effect on power. We are not doing that in the bill as now written. This amendment would therefore improve the bill. I send the amendment to the desk, with the understanding that I may call it up at a later time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I return once again to the first committee amendment. The remainder of the committee amendment, other than the effect of the first three or four lines, which deal with lake levels, is concerned entirely with the health of the people of Chicago. I think it is extremely important for the Senate to recognize that this is the primary purpose of the bill, because we all know, and it has been said over and over again, and never denied, that the Corps of Engineers can now tell us precisely what the effect would be on power. We know what the effect would be on navigation. We know what the effect would be on shore properties. So far as I know, neither the Senator from Oklahoma nor the Senator from Illinois has questioned the competence of the Corps of Engineers to tell us the answers to these questions. So the problem is one of health.

I should like to invite the attention of Senators to a colloquy which took place about a year ago between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin. This colloquy, it seems to me, dramatizes the fact that there has been no expert testimony in support of the bill to show that the health problem would be solved by passing the bill.

I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD volume 104, part 15, page 19129:

Mr. PROXMIRE. First, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois if, on the basis of the 758 pages of transcribed hearings, there is any basis for the contention that the diversion would safeguard or improve the health of the people of Chicago?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Has any study been made by the Chicago Board of Health to support this assertion, or has any study been made by any other health agency in Chicago?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Studies have been made by the sanitary district.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am talking about a health organization, a health agency, or a health bureau which has responsibility.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Sanitary District of Chicago includes a number of suburbs. I may say that there is some health hazard for the down-State communities along the Illinois River. Of course, their drinking water is treated.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is there any officer, official, or person in the Chicago Metropolitan Sanitary District, which controls sewage, who has a medical degree of any kind, or who is in any position to make an evaluation of the effect of effluent on health? If so, will the Senator please identify him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. We have the most eminent hydraulic engineer in the world, in the person of Horace Ramey.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree that Horace Ramey is a distinguished engineer. But if the distinguished Senator from Illinois were ill would he go to an engineer or to a doctor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator from Wisconsin need elaboration on the effect of effluent material on health? We are trying to disguise unpleasant realities with as disinfected verbiage as possible.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I appreciate that reply. I assume, then, that the answer is that no competent health authority has given any testimony to the effect that this diversion would have any influence whatsoever on the health of the people of Chicago. If such testimony has been given, I should be delighted to hear about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to retain the floor this evening, or is he willing to yield to me for the purpose of making a motion to recess?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am perfectly willing to yield to my leader for the purpose of making a motion to recess. I am just beginning my speech. I shall be very eager to carry on tomorrow.

RECESS TO 10 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 48 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Wednesday, September 2, 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 1 (legislative day of August 31), 1959:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Henry E. Stebbins, of Massachusetts, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Kingdom of Nepal.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The following candidates for personnel action in the Regular Corps of the Public Health Service subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law and regulations:

I. FOR APPOINTMENT

To be junior assistant sanitary engineer

Phillip E. Searcy

To be assistant pharmacist

Donald B. Hare

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

Subject to qualifications provided by law, the following for permanent appointment to the grade indicated in the Coast and Geodetic Survey:

To be appointed ensign

James H. Blumer

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Psalm 25: 4: Show me Thy ways, O Lord.

O Thou blessed and eternal God, may we sense Thy guidance more vividly as we undertake the arduous task of finding ways of ministering to the welfare of all mankind.

We humbly acknowledge that our plans and purposes, our efforts, and endeavors for the establishment of a finer social order are frequently so futile and fruitless.

Inspire our Speaker and the Members of this legislative body with a deep concern for the honor and security of our beloved country and may they always perceive what is needful and propose what is right.

May we earnestly strive to keep inviolate the faith of our God-fearing fathers who were guided by lofty spiritual principles in their labors to build a great nation.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 994) entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Spokane Valley project, Washington and Idaho, under Federal reclamation laws."

STATE TAXATION OF INCOME DERIVED FROM INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. CELLER submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (S. 2524) relating to the power of the States to impose net income taxes on income derived from interstate commerce and establishing a Commission on State Taxation of Interstate Commerce and Intergovernmental Taxation Problems.

THE SPIRIT OF LIBERTY STILL LIVES IN POLAND

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, today is the 20th anniversary of Hitler's rape of the city of Warsaw, Poland. That city, 85 percent destroyed, that country, which lost over 6 million people in World War II, still courageously strive for freedom.

I was there on yesterday as one of our delegates to the Interparliamentary Union. Mr. Speaker, our congressional delegation to the 47th Interparliamentary Union Conference distinguished itself. Our colleague, THADDEUS MACHROWICZ, of Michigan, a native of Poland, a former officer in the Polish Army, made the opening address. He spoke in Polish. He recounted the events of 20 years ago—the Hitler-Stalin Pact, the attack on Poland, first by Hitler's legions and then by the Soviet masses. When he had concluded, he received a wild ovation and though the Communist press reported little of what he had said, the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe soon dispensed the news throughout Poland. Our colleague, by the time I left Poland, was becoming a national hero.

I can report to all of you that the spirit of liberty still lives in this land. That the people, despite propaganda, love and admire our great country. That the churches are open and crowded each day with devout worshipers.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we performed a unique function in going behind the Iron Curtain and speaking freely and without hesitation to the parliamentarians of the world.

The Iron Curtain cannot stand too many events such as this.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Public Works Committee may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill H.R. 8678.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, was the gentleman asking to transact business on behalf of a committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request was that the committee have until midnight tonight to file a report.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in the future those transacting business on behalf of a committee take one of the microphones so that we may be able to hear what the requests are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a good idea.

CONSIDERATION OF DISTRICT BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker may recognize a Member on tomorrow to call up and the House to consider District of Columbia business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts would inform the House as to what bills will be considered.

Mr. McCORMACK. The following bills will be called up:

First. S. 2035, amend an act to establish a code of law.

Second. H.R. 6123, amend the law relating to indecent publications and gambling.

Third. S. 685, Association for Childhood Education International, exempt from taxation, property.

Fourth. S. 1372, jurisdiction, domestic relations branch, municipal court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 36) for the relief of Page A. Wilson.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXEMPTING FROM TAXATION THE UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1921) to exempt from taxation certain property of the United Spanish War Veterans, Inc., in the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, for the surviving veterans of the war with Spain, fought over 60 years ago by land and by sea, in the Atlantic and Pacific, I am extending to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN], the great chairman of the District Committee, and all the members of that committee, expression of deepest appreciation for reporting out this bill, and bringing it to the floor of the House in time for passage before we adjourn.

S. 1921 merely gives tax exemption to the property in the District of Columbia owned by the United Spanish War Veterans, the oldest functioning war veteran organization in our country, and used as national headquarters. The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other veteran organizations enjoy similar tax exemption.

The USWV previously had not sought tax exemption on its property, which doubtless would have been granted, as it had been to other veteran organizations, because of the pride the Spanish War veterans had in paying their own way. But now there are not many veterans left of that war of the long past. The average age of the veterans is 82. Naturally the dues from members do not make a very heavy total, still sufficient to keep things going, insufficient to provide for the retirement of four faithful workers at the national headquarters who have given 30 to 40 years of their lives in the service of the United Spanish War Veterans. Under the circumstances exemption from an annual tax of little more than $600 has an importance far beyond the normal measure in dollars.

The appreciation of the Spanish War veterans is deep and real for the cooperation of the majority and minority leaderships in bringing up this bill in time for its enactment into law prior to the National Encampment of the USWV, Commander in Chief Hammond is one of the relatively few members of our Army in 1898 who served both in the combat army in Cuba, in the siege of Santiago, and in the period of combat in the Philippines. I know the joy it will give him to announce to his comrades at the National Encampment that in the 86th Congress, most of the Members of which are veterans of one or both of the larger World Wars, there has been no forgetting of the boys of '98. Adjutant General McElroy has requested me to give especial mention to Congressman ROY WIER, always a stout friend of the Spanish War veterans, who undertook to guide the bill in the House District Committee after its passage by the other body.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close without repeating the sentiment I expressed when my colleagues in the House in the 85th Congress unanimously passed the bill increasing the pension of our Spanish War widows. When the time shall come that in this body there is left only one Member who served in World War I and later only one Member left who served in World War II, younger colleagues will give what you have given me. They will feel, when only one remains, the responsibility that I have felt, and the understanding of their colleagues will open their hearts to affectionate emotions as your generous understanding has opened mine.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That that part of the real property described as lot 886, in square 677, situated in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, which comprises the undivided one-half interest owned by the United Spanish War Veterans, Incorporated, is hereby exempt from all taxation so long as the same is owned and occupied by the United Spanish War Veterans, Incorporated, and is not used for commercial purposes, subject to the provisions of sections 2, 3, and 5 of the Act entitled "An Act to define the real property exempt from taxation in the District of Columbia", approved December 24, 1942 (56 Stat. 1089).

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ISABEL M. MENZ

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1392) for the relief of Isabel M. Menz.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Isabel M. Menz, of Saint Paul, Minnesota, the sum of $717.95. The payment of such sum shall be in full satisfaction of all her claims against the United States for payment of certain money orders payable to Clifford J. Menz (deceased), which were issued during the period from March 15, 1916, through November 22, 1937, but which, due to the illness of the said Clifford J. Menz, were not presented for payment within the period in which they could have been received by the Post Office Department: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this Act in excess of 10 per centum thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this Act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDMUND A. HANNAY

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Edmund A. Hannay.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the widow of Colonel Claud C. Smith, 7015041, the sum of $6,675. Such sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims for compensation for a dwelling house which was erected by the said Colonel Claud C. Smith in 1934 and 1935 on the Fort Jackson Military Reservation, South Carolina, and which has been used by the Army since the said Colonel Claud C. Smith was forced to vacate the same on March 9, 1942, no compensation having been received for such house by the said Colonel Claud C. Smith or his heirs: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this Act shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this Act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JULIA MYDLAK

The Clerk called the bill (S. 464) for the relief of Julia Mydlak.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Julia Mydlak shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act, upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out lines 3 through the language "quota is available:" on line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That, the Attorney General is authorized and directed to cancel any outstanding orders and warrants of deportation, warrants of arrest, and bond, which may have issued in the case of Julia Mydlak. From and after the date of the enactment of this Act, the said Julia Mydlak shall not again be subject to deportation by reason of the same facts upon which such deportation proceedings were commenced or any such warrants and orders have issued:".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNIBALE GIOVANNI PELLEGRINI

The Clerk called the bill (S. 640) for the relief of Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of sections 101(a)(27)(A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act the minor child, Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini, shall be held and considered to be the natural born alien child of Mr. and Mrs. Mose G. Quilici, citizens of the United States: Provided, That the natural parent of Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini shall not, by virtue of such parentage, be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That, in the administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini, shall be eligible for a visa as a nonimmigrant temporary visitor: Provided, That the administrative authorities find that the said Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini is coming to the United States for the purpose of adoption by Mr. and Mrs. Mose G. Quilici, citizens of the United States, and that he is found otherwise admissible under the immigration laws. In the event the adoption of the said Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini by the said Mr. and Mrs. Mose G. Quilici does not occur within the time necessary to conclude final adoption proceedings under the laws of the State in which the said Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini is to be adopted, he shall be required to depart from the United States and upon failure to do so shall be deported in accordance with the provisions of sections 242 and 243 of the Immigration and Nationality Act. In the event the adoption of the said Annibale Giovanni Pelligrini by the said Mr. and Mrs. Mose G. Quilici shall occur, the Attorney General is authorized and directed to record the lawful admission for permanent residence of the said Annibale Giovanni Pellegrini as of the date of the payment by him of the required visa fee: Provided further, That the natural parent of the beneficiary shall not, by virtue of such parentage, be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act."

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES HEALTH BENEFITS PROGRAM

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2162) to provide a health benefits program for Government employees, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That this Act may be cited as the 'Federal Employees Health Benefits Act of 1959'.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

"(a) 'Employee' means an appointive or elective officer or employee in or under the executive, judicial, or legislative branch of the United States Government, including a Government-owned or controlled corporation (but not including any corporation under the supervision of the Farm Credit Administration, of which corporation any member of the board of directors is elected or appointed by private interests), or of the municipal government of the District of Columbia, and includes an Official Reporter of Debates of the Senate and a person employed by the Official Reporters of Debates of the Senate in connection with the performance of their official duties, and an employee of Gallaudet College, but does not include (1) a member of a 'uniformed service' as such term is defined in section 1072 of title 10 of the United States Code, (2) a noncitizen employee whose permanent-duty station is located outside a State of the United States or the District of Columbia, or (3) an employee of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

"(b) 'Government' means the Government of the United States of America (including the municipal government of the District of Columbia).

"(c) 'Annuitant' means—

"(1) an employee who on or after the effective date of the provisions referred to in section 15 retires on an immediate annuity, under the Civil Service Retirement Act or other retirement system for civilian employees of the Government, after twelve or more years of service or for disability,

"(2) a member of a family who receives an immediate annuity as the survivor of a retired employee described in clause (1) or of an employee who dies after completing five or more years of service,

"(3) an employee who receives monthly compensation under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act as a result of injury sustained or illness contracted on or after such date of enactment and who is determined by the Secretary of Labor to be unable to return to duty, and

"(4) a member of a family who receives monthly compensation under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act as the surviving beneficiary of (A) an employee who, having completed five or more years of service, dies as a result of illness or injury compensable under such Act or (B) a former employee who is separated after having completed five or more years of service and who dies while receiving monthly compensation under such Act on account of injury sustained or illness contracted on or after such date of enactment and has been held by the Secretary of Labor to have been unable to return to duty.

For the purpose of this subsection, "service" means service which is creditable for the purposes of the Civil Service Retirement Act.

"(d) 'Member of family' means an employee's or annuitant's spouse and any unmarried child (1) under the age of nineteen years (including (A) an adopted child, and (B) a stepchild or recognized natural child who lives with the employee or annuitant in a regular parent-child relationship), or (2) regardless of age who is incapable of self-support because of mental or physical incapacity that existed prior to his reaching the age of nineteen years.

"(e) 'Dependent husband' means a husband who is incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical disability which can be expected to continue for more than one year.

"(f) 'Health benefits plan' means a group insurance policy or contract, medical or hospital service agreement, membership or subscription contract, or similar group arrangement provided by a carrier for the purpose of providing, paying for, or reimbursing expenses for health services.

"(g) 'Carrier' means a voluntary association, corporation, partnership, or other nongovernmental organization which is lawfully engaged in providing, paying for, or reimbursing the cost, of health services under group insurance policies or contracts, medical or hospital service agreements, membership or subscription contracts, or similar group arrangements, in consideration of premiums or other periodic charges payable to the carrier, including a health benefits plan duly sponsored or underwritten by an employee organization.

"(h) 'Commission' means the United States Civil Service Commission.

"(i) 'Employee organization' means an association or other organization of employees which—

"(1) is national in scope or

"(2) in which membership is open to all employees of a Government department, agency, or independent establishment who are eligible to enroll in a health benefits plan under this Act, and which on or before December 31, 1959, applies to the Commission for approval of a plan provided for by section 4(3) of this Act.

"ELECTION OF COVERAGE

"SEC. 3. (a) Any employee may, at such time, in such manner, and under such conditions of eligibility as the Commission may by regulation prescribe, enroll in an approved health benefits plan described in section 4 either as an individual or for self and family. Such regulations may provide for the exclusion of employees on the basis of the nature and type of their employment or conditions pertaining thereto, such as, but not limited to, short-term appointments, seasonal or intermittent employment, and employment of like nature, but no employee or group of employees shall be excluded solely on the basis of the hazardous nature of their employment.

"(b) Any annuitant who at the time he becomes an annuitant shall have been enrolled in a health benefits plan under this Act—

"(1) for a period not less than (A) the five years of service immediately preceding retirement or (B) the full period or periods of service between the last day of the first period, as prescribed by regulations of the Commission, in which he is eligible to enroll in such a plan and the date on which he becomes an annuitant, whichever is shorter, or may continue his enrollment under such conditions of eligibility as may be prescribed by regulations of the Commission.

"(2) as a member of the family of an employee or annuitant—

"(c) If an employee has a spouse who is an employee, either spouse (but not both) many enroll for self and family, or either spouse may enroll as an individual, but no person may be enrolled both as an employee or annuitant and as a member of the family.

"(d) A change in the coverage of any employee or annuitant, or of any employee or annuitant and members of his family, enrolled in a health benefits plan under this Act may be made by the employee or annuitant upon application filed within sixty days after the occurrence of a change in family status or at such other times and under such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations of the Commission.

"(e) A transfer of enrollment from one health benefits plan described in section 4 to another such plan may be made by an employee or annuitant at such times and under such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations of the Commission.

"HEALTH BENEFITS PLANS

"SEC. 4. The Commission may contract for or approve the following health benefits plans:

"(1) SERVICE BENEFIT PLAN.—One Government-wide plan (offering two levels of benefits) under which payment is made by a carrier under contracts with physicians, hospitals, or other providers of health services for benefits of the types described in section 5(1) rendered to employees or annuitants, or members of their families, or, under certain conditions, payment is made by a carrier to the employee or annuitant or member of his family.

"(2) INDEMNITY BENEFIT PLAN.—One Government-wide plan (offering two levels of benefits) under which a carrier agrees to pay certain sums of money, not in excess of the actual expenses incurred, for benefits of the types described in section 5(2).

"(3) EMPLOYEE ORGANIZATION PLANS.—Employee organization plans which offer benefits of the types referred to in section 5(3), which are sponsored or underwritten, and are administered, in whole or substantial part, by employee organizations, which are available only to persons (and members of their families) who at the time of enrollment are members of the organization, and which on July 1, 1959, provided health benefits to members of the organization.

"(4) COMPREHENSIVE MEDICAL PLANS.—

"(A) GROUP-PRACTICE PREPAYMENT PLANS.—Group-practice prepayment plans which offer health benefits of the types referred to in section 5(4), in whole or in substantial part on a prepaid basis, with professional services thereunder provided by physicians practicing as a group in a common center or centers. Such a group shall include physicians representing at least three major medical specialities who receive all or a substantial part of their professional income from the prepaid funds.

"(B) INDIVIDUAL-PRACTICE PREPAYMENT PLANS.—Individual-practice prepayment plans which offer health services in whole or substantial part on a prepaid basis, with professional services thereunder provided by individual physicians who agree, under certain conditions approved by the Commission, to accept the payments provided by the plans as full payment for covered services rendered by them including, in addition to in-hospital services, general care rendered in their offices and the patients' homes, out-of-hospital diagnostic procedures, and preventive care, and which plans are offered by organizations which have successfully operated such plans prior to approval by the Commission of the plan in which employees may enroll.

"TYPES OF BENEFITS

"SEC. 5. The benefits to be provided under plans described in section 4 may be of the following types:

"(1) SERVICE BENEFIT PLAN.—

"(A) Hospital benefits.

"(B) Surgical benefits.

"(C) In-hospital medical benefits.

"(D) Ambulatory patient benefits.

"(E) Supplemental benefits.

"(F) Obstetrical benefits.

"(2) INDEMNITY BENEFIT PLAN.—

"(A) Hospital care.

"(B) Surgical care and treatment.

"(C) Medical care and treatment.

"(D) Obstetrical benefits.

"(E) Prescribed drugs, medicines, and prosthetic devices.

"(F) Other medical supplies and services.

"(3) EMPLOYER ORGANIZATION PLANS.—Benefits of the types specified in this section under paragraph (1) or (2) or both.

"(4) COMPREHENSIVE MEDICAL PLANS.—Benefits of the types specified in this section under paragraph (1) or (2) or both.

"All plans contracted for under paragraphs (1) and (2) shall include benefits both for costs associated with care in a general hospital and for other health service costs of a catastrophic nature.

"CONTRACTING AUTHORITY

"SEC. 6. (a) The Commission is authorized, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes or any other provision of law requiring competitive bidding, to enter into contracts with qualified carriers offering plans described in section 4. Each such contract shall be for a uniform term of at least one year, but may be made automatically renewable from term to term in the absence of notice of termination by either party.

"(b)(1) To be eligible as the carrier for the plan described in section 4(2), a company must be licensed to issue group health insurance in all the States of the United States and the District of Columbia.

"(2) Each contract for a plan described in paragraph (1) or (2) of section 4 shall require the carrier—

"(A) to reinsure with such other companies as may elect to participate, in accordance with an equitable formula based on the total amount of their group health insurance benefit payments in the United States during the latest year for which such information is available, to be determined by the carrier and approved by the Commission, or

"(B) to allocate its rights and obligations under the contract among such of its affiliates as may elect to participate, in accordance with an equitable formula to be determined by the carrier and such affiliates and approved by the Commission.

"(c) Each contract under this Act shall contain a detailed statement of benefits offered and shall include such maximums, limitations, exclusions, and other definitions of benefits as the Commission may deem necessary and desirable.

"(d) The Commission is authorized to prescribe regulations fixing reasonable minimum standards for health benefits plans described in section 4 and for carriers offering such plans. Approval of such a plan shall not be withdrawn except after notice, and opportunity for hearing without regard to the Administrative Procedure Act, to the carrier or carriers concerned.

"(e) No contract shall be made or plan approved which excludes any person because of race, sex, health status, or, at the time of the first opportunity to enroll, because of age.

"(f) No contract shall be made or plan approved which does not offer to each employee and annuitant whose enrollment in the plan is terminated, other than by a cancellation of enrollment, a temporary extension of coverage during which he may exercise the option to convert, without evidence of good health, to a nongroup contract providing health benefits. An employee or annuitant who exercises this option shall pay the full periodic charges of the nongroup contract, on such terms or conditions as are prescribed by the carrier and approved by the Commission.

"(g) The benefits and coverage made available pursuant to the provisions of subsection (f) shall, at the option of the employee or annuitant, be noncancelable by the carrier except for fraud, overinsurance, or nonpayment of periodic charges.

"(h) Rates charged under health benefits plans described in section 4 shall reasonably and equitably reflect the cost of the benefits provided. Rates under health benefits plans described in section 4 (1) and (2) shall be determined on a basis which, in the judgment of the Commission, is consistent with the lowest schedule of basic rates generally charged for new group health benefit plans issued to large employers; rates determined for the first contract term shall be continued for subsequent contract terms, except that they may be readjusted for any subsequent term, based on past experience and benefit adjustments under the subsequent contract; any readjustment in rates shall be made in advance of the contract term in which they will apply and on a basis which, in the judgment of the Commission, is consistent with the general practice of carriers which issue group health benefit plans to large employers.

"CONTRIBUTIONS

"SEC. 7. (a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, the contribution of the Government to the subscription charge of a plan for each enrolled employee or annuitant shall be such amounts as the Commission by regulation may from time to time prescribe. The amounts so prescribed shall not—

"(A) be less than $1.25 or more than $1.75 biweekly for an employee or annuitant who is enrolled for self alone, or

"(B) be less than $3 or more than $4.25 biweekly for an employee or annuitant who is enrolled for self and family, except that if a nondependent husband is a member of the family of a female employee or annuitant who is enrolled for herself and family the amount so prescribed shall not be less than $1.75 or more than $2.50 biweekly.

"For an employee or annuitant enrolled in a plan described under section 4 (3) or (4) whose biweekly subscription charge is less than $2.50 for an employee or annuitant enrolled for self alone or $6 for an employee or annuitant enrolled for self and family, the contribution of the Government shall be 50 per centum of such subscription charge, except that if a nondependent husband is a member of the family of a female employee or annuitant who is enrolled for herself and family the contribution of the Government shall be 30 per centum of such subscription charge.

"(2) There shall be withheld from the salary of each enrolled employee or annuity of each enrolled annuitant so much as is necessary, after deducting the contribution of the Government, to pay the total charge for his enrollment. The amount withheld from the annuity of an annuitant shall be equal to the amount withheld from the salary of an employee when both are enrolled in the same plan providing the same health benefits.

"(3) The contributions of the Government as initially determined by the Commission and the contributions of the employees and annuitants may from time to time be readjusted, subject to the limitations on amounts contained in paragraph (1), on the basis of past experience and proposed benefit adjustments, such readjustment to be in the same ratio as the contributions of the Government bear to the contributions of the employees and annuitants at the time of the initial determination by the Commission.

"(b) An employee enrolled in a health benefits plan under this Act who is placed in a leave without pay status may have his coverage and the coverage of members of his family continued under such plan for a period not to exceed one year in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commission. Such regulations may provide for the waiving of contributions by the employee and the Government.

"(c) The same authorized to be contributed by the Government with respect to any employee shall be paid from—

"(1) the appropriation or fund which is used for payment of the salary, wage, or other compensation of such employee,

"(2) in the case of an elected official, from such appropriation or fund as may be available for payment of other salaries of the same office or establishment,

"(3) in the case of an employee in the legislative branch whose salary, wage, or other compensation is disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, from the contingent fund of the House, and

"(4) in the case of an employee in a leave without pay status, from the appropriation or fund which would be used for the payment of the salary of such employee if he were in a pay status.

The sums authorized by subsection (a)(1) to be contributed by the Government with respect to any annuitant shall be paid from annual appropriations which are hereby authorized to be made for such purpose.

"(d) The Commission shall provide for conversion of rates of contribution specified in this section in the cases of employees and annuitants paid on other than a biweekly basis, and for this purpose may provide for adjustment of any such rate to the nearest cent.

"EMPLOYEES HEALTH BENEFITS FUND

"SEC. 8. (a) There is hereby created an Employees Health Benefits Fund, hereinafter referred to as the "Fund", to be administered by the Commission, which is hereby made available without fiscal year limitations for all payments to approved health benefits plans. The contributions of employees, annuitants, and the Government described in section 7 shall be paid into the Fund.

"(b) Portions of the contributions made by employees, annuitants, and the Government shall be regularly set aside in the Fund as follows: (1) a percentage, not to exceed 1 per centum of all such contributions, determined by the Commission as reasonably adequate to pay the administrative expenses made available by section 9; (2) for each health benefits plan, a percentage, not to exceed 3 per centum of the contributions toward such plan, determined by the Commission as reasonably adequate to provide a contingency reserve. The income derived from any dividends, rate adjustments, or other refunds made by a plan shall be credited to its contingency reserve. The contingency reserves may be used to defray increases in future rates, or may be applied to reduce the contributions of employees and the Government to, or to increase the benefits provided by, the plan from which such reserves are derived, as the Commission shall from time to time determine.

"(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest and reinvest any of the moneys in the Fund in interest-bearing obligations of the United States and to sell such obligations of the United States for the purposes of the Fund. The interest on and the proceeds from the sale of any such obligations shall become a part of the Fund.

"ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

"SEC. 9. (a) There are hereby authorized to be expended from the Employees' Life Insurance Fund, without regard to limitations on expenditures from that Fund, for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961, such sums as may be necessary to pay administrative expenses incurred by the Commission in carrying out the health benefits provisions of this Act. Reimbursements to the Employees' Life Insurance Fund for sums so expended, together with interest at a rate to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be made from the Employees Health Benefits Fund.

"(b) The Employees Health Benefits Fund is hereby made available (1) to reimburse the Employees' Life Insurance Fund for sums expended by the Commission in administering the provisions of this Act for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 and (2), within such limitations as may be specified annually by the Congress, to pay such expenses for subsequent fiscal years.

"ADMINISTRATION

"SEC. 10. (a) The Commission is authorized to promulgate such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

"(b) Regulations of the Commission shall include regulations with respect to the beginning and ending dates of coverage of employees and annuitants and members of their families under health benefits plans, and for such purpose may permit such coverage to continue, exclusive of the temporary extension of coverage described in section 6(f), until the end of the pay period in which an employee is separated from service or until the end of the month in which an annuitant ceases to be entitled to annuity, and in case of the death of such employee or annuitant may permit a temporary extension of the coverage of the members of his family for a period not to exceed ninety days.

"(c) Any employee enrolled in a plan under this Act who is removed or suspended without pay and later reinstated or restored to duty on the ground that such removal or suspension was unjustified or unwarranted shall not be deprived of coverage or benefits for the interim but shall have his coverage restored to the same extent and effect as though such removal or suspension had not taken place, and appropriate adjustments shall be made in premiums, subscription charges, contributions, and claims.

"(d) The Commission shall make available to each employee eligible to enroll in a health benefits plan under this Act such information, in a form acceptable to the Commission after consultation with the carrier, as may be necessary to enable such employee to exercise an informed choice among the types of plans referred to in section 4. Each employee enrolled in such a health benefits plan shall be issued an appropriate document setting forth or summarizing the services or benefits (including maximums, limitations, and exclusions), to which the employee, or the employee and members of his family, are entitled thereunder, the procedure for obtaining benefits, and the principal provisions of the plan affecting the employee or members of his family.

"STUDIES, REPORTS, AND AUDITS

"SEC. 11. (a) The Commission shall make a continuing study of the operation and administration of this Act, including surveys and reports on health benefits plans available to employees and on the experience of such plans.

"(b) The Commission shall include provisions in contracts with carriers which would require carriers to (1) furnish such reasonable reports as the Commission determines to be necessary to enable it to carry out its functions under this Act, and (2) permit the Commission and representatives of the General Accounting Office to examine records of the carriers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(c) Each Government department, agency, and independent establishment shall keep such records, make such certifications, and furnish the Commission with such information and reports as may be necessary to enable the Commission to carry out its functions under this Act.

"REPORTS TO CONGRESS

"SEC. 12. The Commission shall transmit to the Congress annually a report concerning the operation of this Act.

"ADVISORY COMMITTEE

"SEC. 13. The Chairman of the Commission shall appoint a committee composed of five members who shall serve without compensation, to advise the Commission regarding matters of concern to employees under this Act. Each member of such committee shall be an employee enrolled under this Act or an elected officer of an employee organization.

"JURISDICTION OF COURTS

"SEC. 14. The district courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction, concurrent with the Court of Claims, of any civil action or claim against the United States founded upon this Act.

"EFFECTIVE DATE

"SEC. 15. The provisions of this Act relating to the enrollment of employees and annuitants in health benefits plans and the withholding and payment of contributions shall take effect on the first day of the first pay period which begins on or after July 1, 1960."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] for 20 minutes.

The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have requested consideration of S. 2162 under suspension of the rules in order that a Federal employees health benefits program may receive final approval in this session of Congress. The period between date of enactment and the effective date—next July 1—will be needed for the Civil Service Commission to work out the necessary regulations and the contracts with the various carriers.

Legislation providing for voluntary health insurance for Federal employees has been before the Congress for the past 5 years. On each occasion it seems there has been difficulty in meeting objections voiced by those who would provide the health benefits and by the employees who would pay a share of the costs, as well as objections by the Government which would be called upon to pay a substantial amount toward the health program proposed for its employees.

I believe that I can say, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation now represents a meeting of the minds of all concerned. It has been greeted with enthusiasm on the part of Federal employees and I think it is considered a very happy solution by those who will provide the services. I also feel assured that the Government agencies concerned are pleased with the committee bill.

In general this legislation provides for the establishment of a health benefits program for Federal employees which will include both basic hospitalization and medical services and extended, or "catastrophic illness," coverage. The minimum biweekly contributions by the Government will be $3 for an employee and family and $1.25 for an individual employee, except that if 50 percent of the subscription charge is less than such minimum the Government will pay the 50 percent. The bill fixes the maximum biweekly Government contribution at $4.25 for an employee and family and $1.75 for an individual employee. Each employee will pay the difference between the Government contribution and the total subscription charge. This will permit employees to obtain coverage best suited to their individual needs. For example, an employee with only one dependent may obtain a plan, suited to his income, to which the Government contributes substantially one-half of the cost, while another employee with heavier responsibilities may obtain a plan with broader benefits to suit his needs by paying somewhat over 50 percent of the cost.

Under the bill as reported by our committee, Federal employees will be given a choice of four different types of health insurance plans. They may select any one of these and it is expected as between the different types there will be sufficient competition to require that those providing the services or indemnities will have to come forth with their very best proposals. In fact, the Civil Service Commission, which is charged with carrying out this program, is enjoined to be sure that the services and charges are at least comparable with the largest group health insurance programs existing in private industry.

The choices of plans which the Federal employees may select are as follows:

First. The service plan or the type of plan generally carried out by Blue Cross-Blue Shield organization;

Second. The indemnity type plan provided by insurance companies;

Third. Certain specific plans presently carried by Federal employee organizations; and Fourth. The group practice prepayment plan, among the best known being Group Health Association here in Washington and Group Health Insurance Plan in New York State.

The bill differs from the Senate passed bill in a number of important respects. These differences, in the judgment of our committee, represent improvements and meet objections that were presented to us at our hearings.

I might say to you that the committee held full and complete hearings on this legislation. Following these hearings, we drew up the amendment to the Senate bill which is a new bill and represents the committee's views. It has the unanimous approval of our committee.

The following are the major differences between our committee bill and the bill as it passed the Senate:

First, we eliminated the retroactive provision of the bill as it would have applied to employees retiring involuntarily after the passage of the bill but before its effective date on July 1, 1960.

Our bill revises the definition covering employee group health plans which would be eligible under the bill. As it passed the Senate, the bill would make eligible only the health plans of national employee groups which are bona fide labor organizations. It would have excluded nearly 300,000 individuals covered by other plans—including groups presently enrolled under health plans—such as employees of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency, and others. Our bill provides a definition which permits these organizations to continue their plans and come under the provisions of S. 2162.

The most important provision, of course, is the sharing of the cost by the Government. Under our bill the service plan and indemnity contracts will have two levels of benefits. This will permit those requiring greater coverage to obtain such a program. The Federal Government, however, would pay the same toward each plan regardless of level of benefits. The additional cost would be paid by the employee.

The bill as passed the Senate contained considerable detail with respect to the service benefit plan. It was the view of our committee that this was misleading and that if all the benefits listed were to be provided, they could be provided at best for no more than 1 year without an increase in the maximum payment contained in the bill for the Federal Government. These descriptions are eliminated in our committee bill, permitting the Civil Service Commission more latitude in working out a health program which is adequate.

While the Senate bill established maximum biweekly employee contributions under the bill, with a matching Government contribution, there is no provision for a minimum contribution.

The Civil Service Commission testified before our committee that they interpreted the Senate-passed bill to permit them to provide any type of a health benefits plan up to the maximum cost. Our committee bill retains the same maximum contribution on the part of the Federal Government. However, it writes in a minimum contribution provision, which in our judgment, is needed in order to establish an adequate program. It also provides sufficient flexibility between the minimum contribution and the maximum contribution so that the program may be operated for a reasonable period of time before rising hospital and medical costs require increases in premiums.

The House bill requires the Civil Service Commission to set aside a contingency reserve of not more than 3 percent of the total contributions. The Senate bill did not contain such a provision, but in the Senate committee report on their bill recommended that this reserve be set aside.

The Senate bill recommended the establishment of an Advisory Council with considerable authority and responsibility for administration and operations. This was opposed strongly by the Civil Service Commission and our committee was besieged by requests from almost every branch of the medical profession—and others—to be represented on this Advisory Council. The committee bill replaces this Advisory Council with an authorization to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission to appoint a five-member advisory committee, to be selected from among Federal employees or officers of Federal employee organizations, to advise on employee problems relating to the program.

The Senate bill would have established a Bureau of Retirement and Insurance within the Civil Service Commission, thus creating a new bureau. This is omitted from our committee bill.

The Senate bill would have required prior submission of contracts to the House and Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committees. This is also omitted from our committee bill.

The estimated first year cost of the legislation, based upon the minimum Government contributions, is $214,000,000—half of which will be paid by the Federal Government and the remaining half by the Federal employees who participate.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that we have a good sound health benefits program for our Federal employees as contained in the proposed committee amendment to S. 2162. I do not expect any controversy with respect to this measure. I hope it will receive the overwhelming approval of the House.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to commend the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, Mr. MURRAY, for the manner in which he expedited consideration of this difficult bill in committee; also for the fairness and adequacy of the hearings. I want to join the gentleman in support of this bill.

Mr. MURRAY. I thank the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the distinguished chairman of our committee has made a fair explanation of the provisions in this proposed legislation. The intent and purpose of the measure have been pretty well explained. I believe the subject matter is familiar to all Members of the House.

I want to pay special tribute to the chairman who has always favored a sound and workable health benefits program. I know something of the long hours and personal attention he has devoted to this complex legislation.

This is an amended Senate bill. Our committee hearings demonstrated the necessity of resolving the many questions involved in the preparation of this measure. Our committee made many improvements, as I see it, in the bill that came from the other body.

This bill has the unanimous approval of the members of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. It has the enthusiastic support of Federal employees. It is approved by the Civil Service Commission. It has the recommendation of all major insurance companies and others who provide for health services. Private enterprise will participate in carrying out the terms of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Members of the House are in general support of this program known as the Federal employees' health benefits program. Legislation to establish a health benefits program for Federal employees has been before the House in each Congress beginning with the 83d. It will close a wide gap between Government in its capacity as employer and the employer in private enterprise with respect to health benefits for employees.

Mr. Speaker, reduced to its simplest terms, this legislation is an authorization for the Civil Service Commission, by contract or other suitable arrangement and within certain dollar limitations, to provide Federal civilian employees protection against expenses of medical care and treatment for themselves and families and the often crushing burden of major, or extended, illness or injury.

In other words, the contracting and related authority under which the Civil Service Commission will provide these health benefits for employees is similar, in effect, to contracting authority under which Government departments and agencies procure goods and services to carry out all essential Government programs. In this instance, the services to be procured represent health benefits for Government employees—a type of service now generally recognized as necessary to an effective working relationship between the Government as an employer and its employees.

Viewed in this light, one of the important results under this legislation will be to facilitate and strengthen the conduct of Government activities in general through improved employee relations. The health program will assist in improving the competitive position of the Government, with respect to private enterprise, in the recruitment and retention of competent civilian personnel needed for the conduct of our defense and other essential Government programs.

This benefit to the Government goes hand in hand with the very valuable health protection made readily available to the employees because the Government will share approximately half of the cost. The addition of health benefits to the existing fringe benefits package for Government employees—which now includes retirement and survivor annuities, group life insurance, annual and sick leave, compensation for job-connected injury or death, uniform allowances, and other benefits—will place Government employees' fringe benefits on a par with those offered by the most progressive private industries.

I will touch briefly on several additional points in the bill which I believe warrant special attention by the Members.

The new health benefits plan will be made available to some 2 million employees and their families, or an estimated 4.5 million individuals, without having to pass any physical examination. Should a covered employee leave Government service, he will have the option to convert his coverage to a private plan without having to pass a physical examination. As all of us know, eligibility for health protection under such a liberal provision will be most helpful, particularly among the senior employees and others who would find it difficult to pass physical examinations.

From a standpoint of clarity, also, the reported bill demonstrates the value of the careful consideration given this measure by your Post Office and Civil Service Committee. A great deal of surplus and confusing language has been eliminated, especially in describing the health benefits which employees will have, making the measure completely understandable for the first time. We have had ample evidence that Government employees and the general public were being completely misled as to the scope and nature of the benefits to be provided under the bill. The proposed committee amendment now before this House removes any possibility of misinterpretation.

During the past several years my studies of proposed health benefit programs for Federal employees have convinced me that the greatest need lies in the area of protection against the cost of extended or "catastrophic" illness or injury. Our committee hearings confirmed this conclusion. We have known that Government employees' participation in so-called basic hospital, medical, and surgical health plans is about on a par with participation by the general public in such plans. Enrollment in these basic plans throughout the United States has grown from 4 million in 1940 to 123 million today, representing 70 percent of the population. Approximately 70 percent of Federal employees presently have this coverage. However, although extended medical coverage for the public has grown from 700,000 in 1952 to 17 million in 1959, only a handful of Federal employees have this protection. This was a matter of primary concern to the committee. The reported bill makes this extremely important protection available to Federal employees, along with the more generally prevalent basic coverage, at a cost within their means.

I also want to point out that no person will be excluded from the new health benefits program because of race, sex, health status, or hazardous nature of employment. Nor will age be any bar at the time of any individual's first opportunity to enroll in the program.

Another major improvement contained in the reported bill is the requirement that the service benefit plan and the indemnity plan—which are expected to be the two largest plans—each must offer at least two levels of benefits. This will enable each and every employee to choose a level of benefits which suits individual and family needs and income. For example, a young employee, in good health and with relatively lesser family responsibilities, may choose a lower level of benefits which will provide protection adequate for his responsibilities, while a senior employee—who well may anticipate the need for a higher level of health benefits—will have access to superior benefits by paying a reasonable additional cost.

It is to be observed, in this connection, that in the original contracts the Government contribution will be exactly the same for the employee who selects the lower level of benefits and the employee who selects the higher level of benefits.

Each employee will have a free choice among health benefit plans in four general categories—a service benefit plan, an indemnity benefit plan, an employee organization plan, and a comprehensive medical plan. There will be one service benefit plan and one indemnity benefit plan, each with two levels of benefits. There may be several employee organization plans and several comprehensive plans, depending upon qualification of existing plans of these types under the standards written into the bill and Civil Service Commission regulations to apply these standards.

Each employee will be furnished full information on all types of plans before he makes his selection, in order to permit him to make an informed choice. Each enrollee under a plan will be given a certificate summarizing the benefits under his plan.

Since this is a program for employees, who will pay half the cost, the reported bill authorizes the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission to appoint a committee of five employees to advise the Commission regarding matters of employee concern. Each member of the committee must be either an employee enrolled in a health benefits plan or an elected officer of an employee organization. This provision insures that the new program will be continued with the same primary objectives intended in the enactment of the legislation, that is, that it shall be a joint Government-employee cooperative health benefit program for Federal employees. Both the Civil Service Commission and the employees will be free at any time to obtain independent advice from medical authorities and from insurance and other providers of health services and benefits.

The Civil Service Commission will submit annual reports covering operations under this legislation, and the Post Office and Civil Service Committee will conduct a continuing review to carry out its responsibility for legislative oversight as provided by section 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

Mr. Speaker, only in a few instances has there been greater unanimity among the members of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee than there is with respect to this measure, as reported by the committee. I believe that this enthusiastic and unanimous agreement foretells the overwhelming approval that the bill will receive in this Chamber, so that the Federal employees' health benefits program may become a reality in this session of Congress.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. The bill provides that it shall include the Official Reporters of Debates in the Senate. Do I understand that it also includes the Official Reporters of Debates in the House?

Mr. REES of Kansas. The House reporters are also included in this bill.

Mr. BOW. The Senate reporters are provided for. I just want the legislative history to show that it includes the Official Reporters of Debates in the House.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I thank the gentleman. The legislative history will show this legislation includes Official Reporters of Debates in the House.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JOHANSEN].

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have commented on more than one occasion that the Federal Government has, among many other roles, the role and responsibility of an employer. It is my belief that in the legislation now before the House the Congress and the Government are meeting a very definite and a long-needed responsibility of the Government as an employer. I strongly urge the support and the adoption of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need to discuss it in great detail, but I should like to point out first of all that the unanimity of the committee in voting out the bill is a tribute to the chairman and the minority leader who both insisted that we have painstaking and thorough hearings on the legislation, and the bill before you is better because those hearings were held. No. 1: The bill is sound in that it provides a maximum of choices to the employee. It provides a maximum of choices both with respect to type of insurance program, covering hospitalization and medical care, and as to the choice that they have between a major emphasis on the catastrophic type of coverage, and the first-cost type of coverage. The fact that they have choices, and that four categories of plans are provided, is the best assurance that we could ask for that the plans will be competitive, and that the maximum benefits will be provided at a minimum of cost to the employee.

I particularly commend the legislation before this House because it provides not only for the so-called service type of program, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and for the insurance, indemnity underwritten types of programs, but it also preserves those plans which have long been in effect and which are a tribute to the initiative of the employees, sometimes as long as 25 and 20 years ago, in setting up their own group hospitalization programs. Those programs are protected, and the option of continuing under them is provided with Government participation in the contributions being added.

Finally, this legislation clearly vests in the Civil Service Commission administrative responsibility for the program. It provides that that responsibility shall go to the matter of starting with a modest type of program costwise, and yet one which has under it a floor of minimum participation and of minimum benefits. I think the fruits of the efforts of the committee testify to the thoroughness with which it has done its work. We have the opportunity here to provide a major advance in the realm of personnel relations between the Government as an employer and the more than 2 million employees and the members of their families.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHANSEN. I am happy to yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, while we on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service think we have brought in a good bill, we are fully aware that we are entering a new and completely untried field so far as the Federal Government is concerned, and there will have to be adjustments made on the basis of trial and error.

Mr. JOHANSEN. The gentleman is entirely correct. That is one reason why we have insisted on a modest start on this program.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the cost of hospitalization and medical treatment has increased so much in the past few years that it is almost necessary to be either a pauper or a millionaire to obtain adequate medical and hospital treatment. In other words, if you are in poverty, you get it free; you get the finest hospitalization all over the United States in various charity hospitals. On the other hand, if you are a millionaire, you can afford the finest in medical treatment. But, as far as Government employees are concerned, people in an average walk of life, when misfortune strikes them and they need hospitalization, many of them have all their savings wiped out and others in many instances go into debt and remain in debt for the balance of their lives. This bill is the answer, this is it, as far as solving this very serious problem is concerned for all the Federal employees of this great country of ours.

It is necessary that this be enacted into law at this session of Congress because it will take over a year to get this in proper shape, to put it into effect by next July. For 5 years we have tried many times to get an adequate hospitalization bill, something that would come within the responsibilities of the U.S. Government as well as within the reach of the Federal employees. We failed on many occasions. But this time it looks as though we have arrived at a suitable bill. It certainly fills a great need for every Federal employee in this great Nation of ours.

This legislation has been carefully considered in the other body, which passed it. It has been carefully considered by our committee and passed out unanimously.

Mr. Speaker, one of my most gratifying experiences during this session has been the unanimous sentiment of my fellow members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in favor of enactment of a health insurance program for Federal civilian employees and their families. The committee voted unanimously to report out the bill S. 2162 which is now before the House. This bill, if enacted, would provide a health insurance program for Federal employees to which both the employees and the Government, as their employer, would make financial contributions.

This enthusiastic and unanimous agreement among the members of our committee followed hard on the heels of the overwhelming approval which this bill, S. 2162, received in the other body. I am certain that it foretells the overwhelming approval the bill will receive in this chamber.

Mr. Speaker, at the end of 1958, 123 million people—70 percent of our population—had some kind of insurance protection against the expenses of illness or injury. During our committee's careful and extensive hearings on S. 2162, it was developed that out of the 123 million who had some form of health insurance protection, approximately 89 million were nongovernment employees and their dependents whose insurance was acquired in connection with their employment. I regret to say that, up to now, our Federal employees cannot be counted among the 89 million citizens covered by an insurance plan which is sponsored by an employer.

The U.S. Government month after month compiles statistics on the ever-increasing costs of medical care and on the trend among employers to help insure their employees against these costs. It is hard to understand why this same Government, in the role of employer, should have gone so long without sponsoring a health insurance plan for its own employees.

Perhaps the explanation for our failure to sponsor a health insurance program is that for an organization as large as the Government, it is an extremely complicated proposition. In any event, it is a matter of record that for at least the last 5 years attempts have been made to enact legislation which would have provided health insurance to Federal employees. It is also a matter of record that each time legislation was introduced, it failed of enactment because the various parties in interest could not agree on the kind of program the Government should sponsor.

Now we have this bill, S. 2162, which would provide the kind of health insurance program upon which all parties in interest are in wholehearted agreement; this includes the administration, the employees, and the insurance companies. I must say that I sincerely admire the chairman and members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee of the other body for their ability to formulate a legislative measure with which all parties are in accord. It remains only for Members of this body to signify their agreement.

Mr. Speaker, during the extensive hearings before our committee, I was much impressed by two earnest young men who came to testify from New York at their own expense in favor of health insurance legislation. These two young men stated that they were representing some 800 supervisors of the Navy Department who were responsible for the efforts of more than 4,000 scientific personnel in naval establishments across the Nation who were engaged in perfecting nuclear propulsion systems, antisubmarine warfare systems and guided missiles.

These two young men—and I think they are representative of all the scientific and technical people in the Government upon whom our national security largely depends—explained the difficulties they were having in recruiting the scientists and engineers we so badly need. One of the young men stated:

> During recruitment interviews the medical area is painfully avoided. The applicant, however, well aware of the fringe benefits commonly offered by outside industries, invariably raises this issue. Such remarks as, "You mean the Government doesn't have this coverage?" or "Why doesn't the Government have medical coverage? The other two companies I was interviewed by did" are common during any college recruitment session.

This short simple statement eloquently says what many witnesses before our committee tried to communicate: Our continued failure to provide a health insurance program for Federal employees has not only put the Government far behind industry in this respect, it is affecting us where it hurts most—in the area of maintaining our national defense and prestige.

It was my pleasure and privilege to introduce H.R. 8210 which is a companion bill to S. 2162. If this legislation is enacted into law, and I sincerely trust and hope it will be, it will be a great day for the loyal employees of our Government and will help to prevent untold suffering and thereby greatly help those people when they are in need of adequate hospital care and medical treatment.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BROYHILL].

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of two Federal employee health insurance bills very similar to S. 2162, I view the consideration of the present proposal with considerable interest. May I therefore urge the passage of this worthy legislation without delay.

We have deprived the employees of the Federal Government of benefits taken for granted by the other segments of our economy long enough. More than 75 percent of the 123 million persons who are enrolled in prepaid health benefit plans in the United States today are enrolled through the places where they work. This is indeed a clear indication of the wide acceptance by private employers of their employees' right to certain health benefits. I can see no reason for the Federal Government to provide less for the more than two million persons it employs than does private industry. Certainly the financial rewards of Government service are not so great that we can afford to ignore the importance of job-related health benefits.

We are most fortunate that the legislation before us today has received close and thorough scrutiny. For a dozen years measures to provide health insurance coverage to Federal employees have been presented to Congress. S. 2162 is very similar to a number of bills, including my own, introduced in both Houses of Congress during this session. It is a careful compromise with the wishes of the administration. The Senate has given the measure overwhelming endorsement. This House, I hope, will do the same. S. 2162 also has the support of interested organizations—the insurance industry and the voluntary plans, the American Medical Association and the American Hospital Association, as well as Federal employee unions.

There has been some discussion as to whether the Government's share of this program would constitute too great a financial burden. May I remind the critics of S. 2162 that the original bill considered by the Senate committee provided for a Government payment of two-thirds of the cost of the bill. The 50–50 sharing of cost under this proposal seems to me to be an equitable and reasonable compromise.

Perhaps the outstanding merit of this bill is that it would provide Federal employees with generous health benefits at a cost which they can afford, and without having to pass physical examinations. Studies of popular attitudes toward health insurance reveal that a primary reason for lack of coverage is the expense of certain plans. The range of minimum and maximum biweekly premiums under this plan—from $1.25 to $1.75 for individual employees and from $3 to $4.25 for employees with families eliminates this drawback.

Another reason frequently cited for lack of coverage is that insurance benefits have been lost upon change of job. S. 2162 would not only provide that retired employees continue to receive benefits upon payment of their share of the premium, but also permit employees to convert their coverage if they left the Government.

I want to emphasize, too, that the health benefits provided by the bill are broadly protective. There is no fine print. Under S. 2162 Federal employees could receive not only generous basic health benefits but also major medical expense benefits. Hospital care, surgery, and limited care for tuberculosis and nervous or mental conditions would be included among the basic health benefits. We were gratified to hear Blue Cross officials promise that they would be willing to provide the maximum basic benefits, such as 120 days of hospital care under the maximum contribution rates, as spelled out in the bill.

The major medical provisions of S. 2162, which supplement the basis benefits of the bill, would provide Federal employees with coverage frequently excluded from voluntary health insurance plans. Enrollment in major medical plans providing protection for expenses of so-called "catastrophic" illness or injury has grown from 500,000 in 1952 to 17 million today—yet only a handful of Federal employees have been able to afford this protection. S. 2162 will close this serious gap in health benefits for Federal employees and their families.

There is yet another important advantage to this proposal. S. 2162 has combined simplicity of administration and freedom of choice for the individual. The individual employee would be able to choose between several health insurance plans, a factor I am sure we all consider important. Yet part of the choice would be limited to two nationwide plans. These are representative of the two major types of health insurance in this country—voluntary, nonprofit plans and commercial plans. In addition, the employee would be free to participate in group practice plans and plans sponsored by employee organizations where these were available.

It is my considered opinion that S. 2162 is in every respect a health benefits bill for Federal employees of which we can all be proud. Moreover, this particular bill has been strongly supported by interested groups. We have the opportunity to give untold relief to thousands of Federal employees who often go from month to month without knowing how their medical bills will be paid.

There has been ample time for careful study and deliberation over this question. The time is ripe. I respectfully urge the members of this body to hesitate no longer. Let us do our part in insuring the continuation of high standards which will make Government service an attraction and not a sacrifice. Let us enact S. 2162, as amended, into the law of the land.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as author of two health insurance bills, H.R. 494 and H.R. 8222, I am glad to support legislation which would establish a health insurance program for Federal employees.

The Federal employees, in my opinion, definitely need a program which will provide them with health insurance benefits during their active service with the Government and after their retirement. Such a program should also provide similar care for the dependents of these employees.

I introduced H.R. 494 at the beginning of the present Congress, which provided that the Government and the employees would share the cost of the benefits proposed for a health program, the Government to contribute two-thirds and the employees one-third.

I felt at that time that this division of cost was sound and that the Government should pay the larger share of the cost. I realize that at times we must be guided by the practicalities of the legislative situation. Also, I recognize the fact that there is considerable difference of opinion as to the extent to which the Government should share the cost. Much of this opinion favors a smaller Government contribution than I proposed in H.R. 494.

Mr. Speaker, the big difference between H.R. 494 and H.R. 8222 is on the ratio of costs between the employee and the Government. H.R. 494 provided that employees pay one-third, the Government pay two-thirds, and covered those already retired. H.R. 8222 provided a 50–50 ratio for payment and covers only active employees and those who are involuntarily retired before the active date of this legislation. This bill is similar to the Senate-approved bill, S. 2162, and my purpose in introducing it was to expedite action on this legislation.

While the contribution of the Government has been reduced in the second bill, that portion which would have to be paid by the employee still is within the means of a person who has the limited income of many Federal employees. In my opinion, to have a program that is acceptable to our employees, we must provide sufficient contribution for a practical health program, plus an adequate insurance plan against the catastrophic illnesses.

For some 12 years the legislation to provide health benefits to Federal employees has been before the House and Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committees. I strongly feel that the time is right for consideration and approval of a health insurance program for our Federal employees. Today the average employee in the Government makes only about $100 per week. It is therefore not at all difficult to understand the need that these employees have for health protection to themselves and for their dependents. All of us recognize the costs involved for a catastrophic illness or extended illness, such as tuberculosis, cancer, muscular dystrophy, and heart attacks.

This extended illness with the accompanying terrific expense, without some form of catastrophic sickness insurance, can hardly be borne financially by the Government employees in the top pay brackets, much less by the average Government employee. The legislation now before us will provide this much needed protection to our Federal employees.

Of equal importance in this health insurance program is the opportunity which employees should have to choose one of several different types of coverage. This is also a feature of this bill. I feel very strongly that our employees should be able to choose the plan which best fits their needs. This legislation will allow the individual to choose between a benefit service plan, and indemnity-type plan, and in some instances, a group prepayment plan, or a program in his own employee organization. This choice of plans must certainly be in any piece of legislation passed by the House.

There is one other aspect of this legislation which we should consider at this time. We are all most interested in maintaining the high quality of employees in the Federal Government. If the Federal Government in the future is to be able to attract able young people, it must be regarded by them as a progressive employer. It is well recognized that practically all of the progressive employers in this country today have health insurance programs for their employees. This legislation should prove, therefore, to be an effective means of attracting and retaining the well-qualified career type employees who are so necessary for an efficient and effective civil service.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to present my views and I commend my colleagues for their hard work on this type of legislation. I commend our chairman for scheduling and holding hearings and I believe that the legislation which the Congress adopts will be a bill which will meet in large part the hospital and medical needs of our Federal employees.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALLHAUSER].

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALLHAUSER. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162 and wish to pay my respects to the distinguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, the Honorable TOM MURRAY, of Tennessee, and the ranking minority member, the Honorable EDWARD H. REES, of Kansas, for their capable leadership and untiring efforts to bring legislation before the full membership that is carefully designed to give the maximum protection to the loyal army of Federal employees within reasonable governmental budgetary limits. This has been a truly bipartisan effort by all members of this committee.

I believe that the Federal Government has the utmost responsibility with respect to prepaid health service protection for its employees and their families. The action of the Federal Government undoubtedly will exert great influence upon other employers by the example it provides, thereby effectively increasing the welfare of the entire Nation.

Our legislation is the result of long and detailed hearings during which we had the benefit and advice of experts in the field, and in my opinion, is a completely reasonable effort to solve this complex problem.

The administration of the program by the Civil Service Commission guarantees that it will be effectively and honestly administered. We will have the benefit of a continued study by the Commission of the operation and administration of the act, including surveys and reports on health benefits plans available to employees and on the experience of such plans, so that it is evident that we will be able to make improvements in the plan whenever this action is indicated. This provides essential flexibility.

It goes without saying that the need for health insurance has developed as one of the most important requirements of modern life. The medical and allied professions have made such an outstanding contribution to the raising of the standard of healthful living, even within the last decade, that it is important that we enable the several millions of dedicated governmental employees to take full advantage of this forward step in the history of mankind.

It is my sincere hope that all Members, recognizing the great need, will join together today in voting to pass this legislation.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162. This bill provides for a much-needed health and hospitalization program for Federal civilian employees. With this program in operation, our Federal employees will have greater security against disastrous illnesses. I hope this bill passes by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARNAHAN]

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I support S. 2162 and express appreciation to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY], chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], ranking minority member of the committee, for the excellent work which this committee has rendered to the health of our approximately 2 million Government employees and their dependents.

The general purpose of this legislation is to facilitate and strengthen the administration of the activities of the Government generally and to improve personnel administration in the Government by providing a measure of protection for civilian Government employees against the high, unbudgetable, and, therefore, financially burdensome costs of medical services through a comprehensive Government-wide program of insurance for Federal employees and their dependents, the costs of which will be shared by the Government, as employer, on a 50–50 basis with its employees.

At the present time, a wide gap exists between the Government, in its capacity of employer, and employers in private enterprise, with respect to health benefits for employees. Enlightened, progresssive private enterprise almost universally has been establishing and operating contributory health benefit programs for its employees. Until now, the Government has made scant progress in this area.

This bill is designed to close the gap which now exists and bring the Government abreast of most private employers. It will enable Government employees to purchase protection, at a cost which is within their means.

Employees will be eligible for enrollment in health benefits plans without having to pass any physical examination and, in the event of their separation from Government service, may convert their coverage to a private health benefits plan without undergoing any physical examination. It is intended that the health benefits authorized through this legislation will provide a wide range of hospital, surgical, medical, and related benefits designed to afford the employees full or substantially full protection against expenses of both common and catastrophic illness or injury.

It is a pleasure to support this legislation which provides benefits for a deserving group of dedicated and hard working Federal employees including a large number of Federal employees in the Eighth Congressional District of Missouri, the district I have the honor and privilege of representing.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT].

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, the bill S. 2162 now before the House is the culmination of many years of effort and struggle with a most difficult and complex situation.

As long as 15 years ago, the need to provide a system of voluntary health insurance for Federal employees was recognized. This need has grown more acute with the years. At this late date, the U.S. Government, the largest employer in the Nation, does not provide a health insurance program for its own employees. This omission contributes in considerable measure to the expensive turnover among Federal personnel and to the handicap the Government suffers in attracting employees to the civil service.

During the past 10 years, various bills have been introduced which would have permitted health insurance payments to be deducted from employees' salary checks or which would have provided some contributory health insurance. None of these bills held out the promise of solving all the problems connected with a health insurance program and, in spite of the fact that the need for such a program became more pronounced as time went on, none of these bills was ever enacted.

The difficulties which confronted the sponsors of these bills were of at least three kinds:

First, the field of medical practice and therefore the field of health insurance were, and still are, undergoing rapid changes.

Second, the sheer size of the Government—the number and dispersion of its employees—presents a staggering technical problem in devising an administratively workable health insurance system.

Finally, the differing philosophies and objectives of the administration, the Federal employees, and those who would have to underwrite the program—the nonprofit Blue Cross/Blue Shield and the commercial insurance companies—have made agreement difficult.

The bill, S. 2162, as it came to us from the other body is a tribute to the members of the Senate committee who had only a few short weeks to cope with the problems I have mentioned. That committee solved practically all of the technical complexities which confronted it and reconciled the conflicting views of the different parties in interest.

Aside from some perfecting changes which I am sure the committee in the other body would have made had time permitted, and a few substantive ones to which I will allude later, the bill now being considered here is substantially the same one as was enacted by the other body.

I would like to take a moment and review its principal features.

Practically all officers and employees of the Federal Government would be covered. With the exception of Tennessee Valley Authority employees who have their own contributory health insurance program, the bill would cover all employees who are now included under the Government's life insurance program, as well as their dependents. A large majority of insured employees who retire on or after July 1, 1960, and their dependents will be able to continue their coverage. Similarly, the bill permits survivors of deceased employees to remain insured if they wish to do so.

S. 2162 will give employees an unrestricted choice of enrolling in either of two Government-wide plans. One of these plans will be of the service type which pays expenses direct to the doctor and the hospital and the other will be of the indemnity type which reimburses the employee himself for his hospital and medical expenses.

Each of these Government-wide plans will have at least two options, with each option offering benefits at a different level and at a different subscription charge. This will permit an employee to choose not only between the service and indemnity types of benefits, but within each type he will also be able to choose the option which will best take care of the health needs of his family.

Many employees who belong to an association which sponsors a health insurance plan or who live in an area which has a comprehensive medical care plan in operation will have the additional choice of enrolling in one of these plans.

The bill provides that each plan, and the options within each plan, may furnish a wide assortment of benefits, including hospitalization, surgical, medical, obstetrical, and major medical benefits which are designed to protect against the high cost of catastrophic or prolonged illness.

Unlike the bill enacted by the other body, this bill does not attempt to spell out all the specific benefits. In both bills the benefits which will ultimately be provided were left largely to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission which is charged with the responsibility of administering the program. This bill gives the Commission even more flexibility in negotiating with the carriers for the best benefit bargain it can arrange.

S. 2162 requires the Commission to enter into two contracts—one for each of the Government-wide plans—and to approve any employee association plan or comprehensive medical plan which participates in the program. The Commission cannot contract for or approve any plan which is discriminatory in accepting enrollments. This will enable those of our older or disabled employees who cannot now buy insurance, except perhaps at a prohibitively high price, to get this protection at the same price as other employees.

In negotiating the first and subsequent contracts for the two Government-wide plans, the bill requires the Civil Service Commission not only to get the best benefits possible but also to assure itself that the premiums payable under the contracts are reasonable and equitable and that they are competitive with premiums charged other large employers for similar insurance. The specific mandate to make the premium competitive was not contained in the bill passed by the other body; while it is perhaps unnecessary, it will clarify the intent of the Congress on this score and strengthen the Commission's hand when it negotiates with the insurance carriers.

Another feature of this bill which was not included in the bill as it was enacted by the other body is a clause which requires the prime carriers of the two Government-wide plans to allocate an equitable portion of their rights and obligations under their contracts to other eligible carriers who elect to participate. This is a requirement which is very similar to the one the Congress wrote into the life insurance law and it is designed to allow all eligible carriers, large and small, throughout the country to participate in the program.

S. 2162, as it has been reported by our committee, provides that the employee and the Government shall contribute generally on a 50–50 basis to the cost of the health insurance. The bill reported by the other body would have required contribution on a 50–50 basis in every instance.

There are some plans in which the employee may wish to enroll which offer a very high level of benefits. If the 50–50 ratio were to be observed in every case, employees could not enroll in these high benefit-level plans because the subscription charges would exceed the total of the maximum contributions authorized by the bill. To avoid this situation, the reported bill permits an employee who joins a high benefit-level plan to make up the difference, which of course will mean that he will contribute more than the usual 50 percent. Those employees—and it is anticipated they will be in the large majority—who enroll in a plan offering an intermediate but completely adequate level of benefits, will share their subscription charge on a 50–50 basis with the Government.

The maximum level of contributions specified in the bill passed by the other body has been retained in the reported bill. The reported bill expressly permits the Civil Service Commission to fix the amount which the Government can contribute to a plan. However, under the bill passed by the other body, the Commission could similarly but indirectly have controlled the Government's contribution by negotiating for a level of benefits which would have cost no more than an amount 50 percent of which the Commission had predetermined as the maximum total contribution to be made by the Government.

Both the bill now being considered and the bill reported by the other body contain provisions for the setting aside of a fund to pay the expenses of the Civil Service Commission in administering this legislation and of a modest contingency reserve fund to absorb for a time anticipated increases in premium rates. In its report on the bill, the committee in the other body stated it contemplated that 3 percent of contributions were to be set aside as a contingency reserve. The bill now before the House has been changed to provide specifically that this percentage be set aside for this purpose.

This bill provides for an advisory committee composed of five employees who are insured under the legislation or who are officers of employee organizations. In contrast, the bill passed by the other body provided for an 11-member advisory council, only three members of which would have represented employee interests, with the other eight members having no real direct interest in the health insurance program.

Mr. Speaker, our committee has unqualified assurance that the reported bill is entirely acceptable to the administration, to Federal employees, and to the insurance carriers.

It is a very pleasant thought that within the hour we are certain to pass and move along a bill to provide health insurance for the hundreds of thousands of Federal employees. This legislation has been long overdue. Thousands of Government employees have suffered catastrophic illnesses since we first contemplated this legislation seriously in 1954. Other thousands have certainly suffered disabling illnesses and have gone without needed medical benefits for themselves and their families simply because of the financial factor. So it is a very fine thing what the House of Representatives is doing here today. It is something that is bound to improve the health conditions of our employees and their families. It is something that is bound to remove the fear of financial disaster accompanying severe illnesses. With all the hundreds of thousands that will participate in this bill, it becomes certain, as the years go by and as this pilot program—that is basically what it is—is improved and worked over, we are going to be able, because of the great number of participants, to bring more medical benefits per dollar than could possibly have been bought by individuals acting alone.

So, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is long overdue and desirable legislation. It will, I am sure, become the law of the land and become effective as of July 1, 1960. It will constitute a real milestone in the personnel history of the Federal Government. I believe every Member can conscientiously vote for this bill knowing that he is doing something fine for the many people who will benefit.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation. I supported it in committee and I will support it here on the floor. I take this time to call the attention of the House to a provision in the bill which I had hoped could have been brought before the full House, but I recognize the need for having this legislation enacted this year and for that reason I am glad we are able to consider it now under suspension of the rules.

I refer to section 6, wherein the necessity for competition under section 3709 of the revised statutes is removed. This is important only with regard to the service benefit plan. It would have been much better had we allowed the nine insurance companies who each could handle a plan like this to compete and thus to have maintained competition. The administrative expenses of these companies range from 5 to 10 percent. There would have been leeway for the most efficient organization to make a better bid with the result that there would have been a lower price to the Government worker.

We offered such an amendment in committee but it was defeated. I wish that we had an opportunity here today to consider it on the floor, I think it would have made for lower cost to the Government employee. I have great respect for Roger Jones, Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and his fellow Commissioners and staff. I think Chairman Jones is an able and conscientious servant. I know he will do everything he can to get the best deal for the Government employee, but I still regret that in this bill we did not adhere to the principle of competition.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AVERY].

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday I read in the newspaper of a report to the effect that the Federal Government was losing out to private industry in attracting good college students. The students were of the opinion the reward was greater with private industry.

The bill under consideration is a good example of some of the things that should be done in order to make certain the Federal Government can effectively compete with private industry for the young talented working force in the Nation.

At the present time, a gap exists between the Government, in the capacity of employer, and employers in private enterprise, with respect to health benefits for employees. Private enterprise has made great strides in establishing contributory health benefit programs for its employees. The Federal Government has made little progress.

The form of fringe benefit has become a condition of employment for a large segment of private enterprise. It is only sensible that the Government should not fall behind the times by failing to provide for the better health care of its employees.

According to the National Association of Manufacturers the employers' expense of this type of program more than pays for itself—in the form of lowered absenteeism and improved morale.

The bill offers the Federal employee a free choice subject only to the enrollment requirements of the carrier to select the plan of coverage which seems best to fit his needs. The four major categories are as follows:

(a) A Government-wide service benefit plan, such as is offered by Blue Cross/Blue Shield.

(b) A Government-wide indemnity benefit plan, such as is currently offered by several insurance companies.

(c) One of several employee organization plans, such as the present health plans of the National Association of Letter Carriers and the National Federation of Post Office Clerks.

(d) A comprehensive medical plan, which may be either a group-practice prepayment plan, or an individual-practice prepayment plan.

The Government-wide service benefit plan and the Government-wide indemnity benefit plan each will include at least two levels of benefits.

I am pleased to note the Post Office and Civil Service Committee plans to conduct a continuing review of the operation of the program since such is an entirely new area of Federal employees' fringe benefits. This is necessary to protect both the Government and its employees.

I urge passage of the measure by the House.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY].

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162, a bill to provide a health and medical benefits program for Federal Government employees. The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service of which I am pleased to be a member, held 12 days of hearings on this bill and similar bills. Among the bills considered by the committee was my own, H.R. 764. As a new Member of Congress, it was my first official act to introduce H.R. 764 on January 7, 1959, the opening day of the 86th Congress. Providing a health and medical benefit program for the Federal Government employees has been long overdue. Since our Government started in 1789, 170 years ago there never has been a program that provides needed, basic and essential protection for Federal Government employees and their dependents from the health and medical hazards.

Thus, the bill before the House today is historic. But more than this, it is further but belated recognition that the largest employer in the United States, the Federal Government, at long last has seen fit to adopt the most enlightened programs for the improvement of the well-being of its employees that long experience in private industry has amply demonstrated is meritorious.

S. 2162, as amended by the House Committee, provides that the Government and the employee shall share the cost of the benefits on a 50–50 basis. It equitably permits the covered employee to select coverage from every type of existing health benefit plan whether service benefit, indemnity benefit, employee organization plan, or a prepayment plan of a comprehensive nature. The bill authorizes the Civil Service Commission to provide by contract for every basic, essential type of benefit that experience in private industry indicates meets the most pressing health and medical needs of a worker and his family.

Thus the Congress, by passing S. 2162 as amended, is taking a major step in the direction of improving further its relationship with its employees. And not only do the employees benefit, but also the dependents of the covered employees will be eligible under certain restrictions for benefits. As time moves on and experience is gained under the provisions of this new act, there will of necessity be changes. But changes that will be made in the future will be indicated by the best possible guide, namely proven experience.

In such a vast undertaking as the new health and medical program provided by S. 2162 there will be demands upon the Civil Service Commissioners for great prudence in the exercise of their judgment; there will be demands upon the covered employees and their dependents for patience in the evaluation of the benefits of the program; and there will be, finally, demands upon the Members of Congress to forbear in any hasty criticism that might appear to a Member unfamiliar with this highly technical type of program. Thus, this is an historic step that the House will take in passing S. 2162 today. The costs are nominal in comparison with the inestimable human values and resources that will be gained in healthier, happier, and more efficient Federal Government employees. I strongly endorse this program and urge every Member of the House to do likewise.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. TOLLEFSON].

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162 and commend the committee for bringing the bill to the floor. The Federal Government is the largest employer in the United States, yet it has not kept pace with other employers who provide medical care and health programs for their employees. As the report accompanying this bill states, the Government has made scant progress in this area. The bill will enable Federal employees to purchase protection from the high costs of medical care and treatment at a cost which is within their means. The Government itself, as the employer, will contribute 50 percent of the cost of the program. It is a good bill and I trust that the House approves it.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD].

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the distinguished chairman of the committee in support of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, we have the chance here today to write another chapter in American history. It is the history of democratic government taking democratic action to guarantee to a large segment of its citizens financial protection in time of sickness and distress.

But I emphasize that this is democratic action—not paternalistic action. It is action in which the employee of the Government, and justly so, shares his portion of the burden of the cost in the same manner that employees of private enterprise all across the Nation participate in their own health insurance programs. It is the American way of doing things that we are confronted with at this time.

Private enterprise long has recognized the need for assisting its workers in having some measure of protection against the sudden and damaging inroads of illness. The Government has lagged sadly in this field. But we have here today the golden opportunity to take up the slack; to say to the employees of this Government everywhere that they have the same rights and privileges as do the employees of private enterprise.

This is legislation that has been sorely needed for some time. The best thinking of many capable men in the Congress has gone into the plan. Likewise, the best thinking of many capable men in the fields of insurance, medicine, hospitalization and allied efforts also has been written into the program.

There is nothing mandatory in this proposal to offer health insurance to all those in Government employment. Rather, it is a strictly voluntary program as it should be. But I know from the hundreds and hundreds of messages that have come to me from Federal employees everywhere that they will accept this plan readily and with thanks. This is the answer to a need they have felt keenly for years.

Some author once wrote:

The historic moment is always simple and brief.

Let us be simple and brief in this historic moment today as we place our unqualified stamp of approval on this forward-looking and vital piece of legislation.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the committee, the ranking minority member, and the other members for bringing out this valuable legislation.

I think the Federal Government has for too many years lagged behind private industry in not making it possible for Federal workers to purchase health insurance at group rates by authorizing payroll deductions.

Through my association with health legislation during my congressional work, I have become very keenly aware of the health needs of this Nation.

We are fighting an uphill battle against disease, and it is a costly battle. The people are having to pay the bills.

Americans have demonstrated their desire to be able to budget medical expenses by signing up, 123 million of them, for group medical and hospitalization insurance.

Federal workers certainly deserve the same opportunity.

It is a field in which we should be providing leadership, instead of hindrances.

I was delighted by the forward-looking reception which this session of Congress has given this legislation. Its authorization of payroll deductions and equal contributions by the Government to meet program costs make this bill one which properly faces the problem of financing medical expenses. It is a fair bill in that employees may choose whether they want to participate and may select from several plans offered.

I wholeheartedly endorse this legislation.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING].

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this long overdue legislation. As a former member of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee which has jurisdiction over legislation affecting the lives and well-being of our postal and other Federal employees, I have taken a keen interest in and made a detailed study of the provisions of this bill. I am one of those who believes that Uncle Sam has too long lagged behind industry in providing a low-cost health program. As we know in this day of high cost of hospitalization, a single illness for a sustained period can wipe out the financial resources of the average low-to-medium-income family. It is significant to consider that prepaid health benefits are available to some 123 million people in this country and help to pay more than half of the hospital bills and a large part of the doctor bills of the entire Nation. The fact that the voluntary health system has grown into a $4½ billion industry strongly indicates that the American people welcome the opportunity to budget their medical expenses. An overwhelming majority of the persons participating in prepaid health programs are enrolled at the place of their employment. This points up the fact that private employers recognize the importance of cooperating with their employees in obtaining health insurance; programs that have historically contributed to the well-being and efficiency of the workers. I compliment the committee for bringing S. 2162 to the floor. I hope it will be overwhelmingly adopted in the House.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I also rise at this time to endorse this bill now before the House. The fact that it is easy for us to vote for this bill today is due to the long hours of tedious and hard work of your committee on Post Office and Civil Service. They are to be complimented and congratulated for bringing to the floor of the House today this bill that is so important and helpful to the Federal employees.

Although a hospitalization plan for Federal employees has been in the works for many years. I am glad that I have the opportunity at this time to vote in behalf of these worthy servants. This legislation is long overdue.

It is well known that some corporations have voluntarily provided life insurance and health insurance programs for their employees.

The turnover among Government employees continues at a disturbing rate that is inefficient and wasteful. These employees compare what they have with those who work for private industry, and they realize that they are not gaining anything by staying with the Government.

Many companies pay the full costs of hospitalization, not only for their employees, but also for their dependents and for their retired employees and their dependents as well.

As we all know, the Federal Government is the largest employer in the Nation. Under the terms of this bill, more than 2 million Federal employees, plus their dependents, would become eligible for the protection enjoyed by most of those who are in private industry.

The individual Government employee would pay not less than $1.25 or more than $1.75 biweekly, or less than $3 or more than $4.25 biweekly for an employee or annuitant who is enrolled for self and family.

It is unfortunate that this bill does not cover presently retired Federal employees. It is my hope that the Congress will in the near future consider my proposal and other similar ones along this line.

I urge the passage of S. 2162, which will be one of the most constructive pieces of legislation to be enacted at this session. It will mark another milestone in our efforts to make employment with the Federal Government attractive and rewarding.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANTANGELO].

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this legislation and wish to commend the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Civil Service and the members of the committee for introducing and reporting this legislation.

In my opinion, this bill is one of the greatest measures that ever emanated from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service upon which I was once privileged to serve. Under this bill, as I understand it, all Federal employees, regardless of their health, can obtain medical coverage, and no physical examination is required. This is one of the great steps which this country through this committee has taken so far as the welfare of the Federal employees of the United States are concerned.

Under the provisions of this bill employees will have free choice among health benefit plans. The Government contributes one-half of the cost and the cost is shared equally between the Government and the employee. The bill establishes a biweekly maximum of $1.75 for an individual employee, and $4.25 for an employee and his family. I am proud to support this measure, because I believe the cost is reasonable, the coverage is ample, and a Federal employee has a choice of several medical plans.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDMONDSON].

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join this outstanding committee in expressing support for this much needed legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any question about the widespread demand among Federal personnel for this legislation, nor is there any question about the careful study and consideration which have been given in committee to the proposal before us.

The distinguished chairman of the committee has assured me that the committee plans to move on to consideration of similar legislation for retired civil service employees, and the justification for such a program appears to me to be clear and unmistakable.

I hope the House will soon have the opportunity to act favorably upon it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support S. 2162 and look upon it as a means through which our Federal Government can do for its employees the same as enlightened, progressive private business enterprises do for their employees.

This bill will enable Government employees to buy, at a cost which they can afford, insurance which will protect them from unusually heavy medical costs in the event of sickness, injury, or a catastrophe.

The bill will cost only $3.50 a month for an employee with a like amount paid by the Government and give him a free choice among health benefits in four categories: First, Blue Cross-Blue Shield and the like; second, an indemnity plan offered by insurance companies; third, a plan similar to the National Association Letter Carriers; or fourth, a plan like the Kaiser Foundation plan.

Mr. Speaker, the Government will be amply repaid through better morale and greater achievement of its employees.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government has the responsibility of providing a prepaid medical and health insurance plan for its employees. The plan being debated today is not as complete and comprehensive as it should be, but is a good start and certainly well within the scope of employees needs. It is long overdue. It will undoubtedly improve as time goes on, and may I state at this point, I am one who will work toward that end.

It has become a customary practice for private industry to provide medical and surgical services of this kind, and in many cases superior, to their employees. It is no more than proper that the Government do the same thing. It would please me more however, if the Federal Government took the lead in this whole area of employee benefits rather than an attitude of follow the leader. May we look forward in other areas then, as this bill becomes law, and especially in the field of union recognition.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162, the bill to provide for a Government employees health benefits program. I am happy to declare myself wholeheartedly in support of the bill which when enacted into law will provide for the Government to contribute 50 percent of the cost of basic health and hospitalization coverage to persons employed by the Federal Government.

There was a time in the United States when Federal employment was considered to be the very finest type of occupation and when the Government, as employer, was thought to provide the very finest benefits to those whose services it employed.

In recent years we have seen the economic position of Federal civil servants decline. Although a great deal has been said about the fringe benefits available to Federal employees, these loyal workers lag behind the scale of benefits available to those in industrial employment.

Mr. Speaker, the contribution system whereby employers assist, either entirely or in part, in underwriting health programs for their employees is only now being expanded to Federal service. This is one instance in which the number of Federal employees may prove beneficial to the general public. If it is assumed that virtually all Federal employees will enroll under the health benefits program, then it must be assumed also that the health program and the health plan which will be developed by the Civil Service Commission will be such as to set new standards for general health coverage throughout the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is a source of satisfaction to me to know that S. 2162 provides that employees retiring in the future will be protected and will be allowed to continue their health insurance coverage under the provisions of S. 2162.

I am told that hearings will be held tomorrow in the Senate on a bill S. 2575, to provide coverage of civil servants currently retired, provided that they meet the necessary standards of tenure, and so forth. I hope that the bill to protect current retirees may be brought before the House at this session in order that we may have a chance also to approve that legislation.

It is significant that no less a personage than Secretary Flemming, of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, in recommending approval of S. 2162 said:

> We consider it essential that legislation for active employees and future retirees be supplemented in the near future by providing similar protection for those already retired.

Mr. Speaker, civil servants both active and retired are urgently in need of the fullest possible health protection; I feel certain that the House this afternoon will have approved by an overwhelming majority the program to make this coverage a reality.

I am happy indeed to rise in support of this very worthwhile legislation.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I urge the suspension of the rule on S. 2162 and passage of this legislation to provide Federal employees with an essential voluntary health benefits program.

My only criticism of this legislation, which incidentally has the blessing of the executive branch of Government as well as the Civil Service Commission which will administer the act, is that it fails to provide this vital protection to those already retired.

Consequently, I, along with many others of my colleagues in both the House and Senate, have introduced related legislation triggered to the passage of this bill, to provide these same benefits to all who are not eligible for coverage under S. 2162.

In these days of spiraling costs of hospitalization and medical fees, our Federal career employees are certainly entitled to protection at least comparable to that afforded in private industry. In addition, those already retired are all too frequently faced with catastrophic illnesses that literally destroy everything they have spent a lifetime accumulating.

I urge passage of S. 2162 and expeditious consideration of related legislation to include those not otherwise eligible for this coverage.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly committed to the passage of this legislation and am gratified that the very able distinguished gentleman from the great State of Tennessee, my valued friend, Mr. MURRAY, and his very capable committee has reported the bill to the House.

Action on this desirable program to provide for appropriate health benefits for Government employees is actually long overdue. The Federal Government has been seriously lagging behind most private industry in adopting this type of forward-looking, social program.

The health and well-being of Government employees as well as all other employees, workers and people in the Nation is of great and paramount importance. Skilled medical and nursing care, abundant up-to-date hospital facilities available at reasonable cost to all our people is unquestionably necessary today if we are to make effective use of modern medical and hospital services for the care of the sick and the cure and prevention of disease, and keep the Nation physically and mentally well.

The high cost of sickness, like the high cost of living is denying to many the kind of medical and hospital treatment which they need. Some of the costs in this area are extremely high and extremely deterrent to the securing of needed medical care and treatment.

The disparity between Government employees and private enterprise employees cannot be justified. It is causing hardship and lowered morale. It is impairing very seriously the creation and maintenance of decent health standards.

I think that the Congress must be more conscious of the great magnitude of our national health problems and give much more attention to providing adequate solutions at a time when medical science has achieved such amazing power to raise general health standards and extend the expectancy span of human life.

The Federal employees employed by our great Government are and should be the special concern of the Congress.

I am very happy indeed to support this bill and am sure it will be overwhelmingly passed by the House.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2162, a bill to provide health and hospitalization insurance for Federal employees.

The bill before us is the first and very significant step in the program of this Congress to provide health benefits to Federal employees and their families. The bill is a very wholesome one for several reasons. On the one hand it allows the free choice of several types of plans.

Under the first type, the service benefit plan, the Federal civil servant would be able to secure hospital benefits, surgical benefits, and medical treatment both in and out of hospitals. Obstetrical protection is also included. This is the type of plan which is included in the familiar Blue Cross-Blue Shield protection system.

The second type is that in which insurance companies or other indemnity organizations provide actual cash payment to employees who require hospitalization, surgical attention, or medical care.

The third major type is the employee organization plan which protects the Federal employee groups. In most Federal employee associations there is provided a plan of health protection for which the individual employee makes payment in the form of a supplement to his basic duties. In return for this payment, he and his family are given hospital coverage. It is essential for the stability of employee organizations that these plans not be discontinued, and accordingly the feature to allow participation by these plans is highly commendable.

The final type of coverage is the comprehensive medical plan which is developing in some parts of the country. Under this type of plan, all sorts of medical attentions are available to those enrolled in the plan.

We have pased a terrific milestone on the road of progress to the general health of our Nation, and even though the bill before us applies only to Federal employees, the impact on the health of the country must be significant.

The competitive system is certain to develop new types of health plan coverage for the great family of Federal employees. In view of the fact that many industrial employers are already providing more comprehensive coverage for their employees than is included in S. 2162, the type of plan which will be developed by the Civil Service Commission will enable those private groups to secure a greater return on their health insurance dollar.

The most significant departure incorporated in S. 2162 is the concept of Government contribution to the program. Federal employee leaders originally requested that the Federal Government contribute two-thirds to the employees' one-third. The Government in turn proposed that the reverse balance be applied and that the employee contribute two-thirds. The solution as included in S. 2162 is a happy medium, one which is fairer to both parties, one which will have a very beneficial result throughout the country and one which is deserving of speedly passage and enactment into law.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that approval today will be virtually unanimous.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill, S. 2162.

Provision for health insurance benefits for Federal employees should be enacted into law at the current session of Congress. The urgency of such a program appears to me to be so great that we cannot afford further loss of time to make additional studies or to collect additional information.

Already a great deal of factual material has been amassed and its general tenor is that the Government is lagging behind other large employers who already have provided extensive programs of health benefits for their employees. This material which has been gathered and analyzed by congressional committees, Government agencies, insurance organizations, and the unions demonstrates rather conclusively that the benefits of such a program are so advantageous to the Government as well as to the employee that there is no sound reason for delay.

When I introduced my bill, H.R. 6167, it represented my thinking on this subject. I am still of the belief that the program comprised in that bill is sound and is more nearly proportioned to the need for medical care and to the financial circumstances of the greater number of Federal employees. However, I realize that it would be more practical to put into effect as soon as possible even a partial program than to delay legislation by striving for terms which seem to be more nearly adequate. Government employees as a group are so much in need of these benefits that early action is imperative.

It is with that purpose in mind that I support the proposal which is presently pending before the House. The equal division of cost between the Government and the employees would still be a real step toward the establishment of health benefits in keeping with the Federal Government's role as the largest single employer in our good country.

Employers in private business have found it to their own as well as to the employee's advantage to inaugurate a health insurance program and continually improve it. The fact that so many of these firms provide this benefit on a noncontributory basis is in itself impressive evidence that it must be materially worthwhile. It is evidently profitable for the employer to relieve his employees of the worry which accompanies family illness in particular. Then, too, the employee's own health is important because it is so closely related to his efficient performance.

An employee with a relatively small income, and this is true of the majority of Federal employees, may be able to budget his outlays for ordinary medical care out of his regular income, but it so often happens that the need becomes unusually great and costly. Then, too, an unexpected need for surgery or for special types of therapy may develop at any time. Such things are entirely unpredictable, and the only solution that is of any great benefit to the individual is to be covered by a systematic prepayment plan.

The health insurance program which is established now should cover the major part of hospitalization, medical, and surgical expenses. It should also make some substantial provision for those long illnesses which may entirely deplete a person's savings and then leave him with a huge debt. Whatever is done in this regard will be tremendously helpful.

I believe, therefore, that a health insurance program for Federal employees should be established immediately and that, if there cannot be agreement on a program as liberal as in my bill, H.R. 6167, the terms of the bill approved should be such that it can gain wide support and early enactment. Hospitalization and other types of health care are as necessary as adequate food, clothing, and housing. They are among the basic necessities of life. It is with that in mind that I urge immediate passage on this legislation.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak in support and urge the passage of this bill, S. 2162, that is fundamentally designed to improve personnel administration in the Government by providing a reasonable measure of protection for civilian Government employees against the extremely high costs of medical services through a comprehensive program of insurance for Federal employees and their dependents.

For several years, both the executive and legislative branches of Government have recognized the wide gap that exists between the Government, as an employer, and employers in private enterprise, with respect to health benefits for employees. Progressive private enterprise almost universally today operate contributory health benefit programs for its employees.

This bill is an attempt to bring the Government in line with the modern practices of most private employers. It will enable Government employees to purchase protection, at a cost which is within their means, from the unanticipated and usually oppressive costs of medical care and treatment in the event of sickness or injury, as well as the often crushing expense of so-called catastrophic illness or serious injury. Availability of this health protection program to Government employees will be of material assistance in improving the competitive position of the Government with respect to private enterprise in the recruitment and retention of competent civilian personnel so urgently needed to assist in maintaining and improving our strong national defense and in the operation of other essential Government programs.

The addition of the health insurance program provided by this bill will fill a long required need and place the Government on a substantially equal level with progressive industry in the field of employee fringe benefits.

Mr. Speaker, this type of legislation has been under consideration and study, by House and Senate committees, for nearly 10 years. Out of all the evidence and testimony and statistics that have been presented to the committee has come this particular measure after long and diligent effort of the committee chairman and his membership. It is a sound, moderate, reasonable beginning in meeting a challenging legislative problem and I believe that the distinguished chairman of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, together with all the members of that committee, deserve our gratitude for the conscientious and painstaking manner in which they have patriotically attempted to deal with this difficult subject. On this score, I would like to emphasize to my colleagues here that the chairman and committee have registered their intention to conduct a continuing review of the operation of the program to make sure that it is projected with economic efficiency and that any deficiencies or abuses will be adequately amended and corrected as they arise.

I submit that this is a meritorious measure completely in accord with our traditional and fundamental principles of progressive government, and I most earnestly hope that it will be overwhelmingly approved without undue delay.

Mr. COHELAN. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act will, for the first time, enable Federal workers to enjoy health benefits comparable to those available to private employee groups by authorizing payroll deductions and equal benefit contributions by their employer, the Federal Government, and the legislation has my full support.

This is an equalization measure which gives the Federal employee benefits he would probably have realized in previous years had he chosen another line of work. It will, therefore, encourage our Government workers to stay on the job and attract new individuals of ability and competence into this work. In testifying at hearings on this bill, I expressed the interest of the many, many Federal employees working in the Seventh District of California which I represent, and I would again convey their support of this measure now that it is on the floor. Their support is entirely justifiable because they are asking only for equal treatment, not for special consideration.

I urge that the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act receive the very strong support of my colleagues.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of S. 2162, a bill to provide a health benefits program for Government employees.

This is an area in employer-employee relations in which the Federal Government has fallen way behind private enterprise in this country. Large corporations and business firms have established, or are offering in wage negotiations, contributory health benefit programs for employees, recognizing how financially burdensome can be the costs of medical services to them and their dependents. As a matter of fact, some private firms have assumed the full cost of the health benefit programs.

This bill will give the same protection to Government employees. It will enable them to purchase health benefits, at a cost which is within their means, as a cushion against expensive medical treatment and hospitalization in the event of sickness or injury. Half of the cost will be paid by the employees themselves, and the remaining half will be paid by the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this is much needed legislation to help close the gap between the Government as an employer and private enterprise employers with respect to health benefits for employees. I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 383, nays 4, not voting 48, as follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE FOR CERTAIN STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. MILLS submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 213) to provide additional time within which certain State agreements under section 218 of the Social Security Act may be modified to secure coverage for nonprofessional school district employees.

REDUCING THE CABARET TAX

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 2164) to repeal the cabaret tax, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (6) of section 4231 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to imposition of tax with respect to roof gardens, cabarets, and other similar places) is amended by striking out "20 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall apply only with respect to periods after 10 antemeridian on the first day of the first month which begins more than 10 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to reduce the cabaret tax from 20 percent to 10 percent."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks on this bill before the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the bill H.R. 2164 now under consideration is one of 16 bills introduced in this Congress providing for the repeal of the cabaret tax. H.R. 2164 has been amended in the committee to provide for a reduction of the tax from 20 percent to 10 percent, rather than outright repeal.

The fact that 16 similar bills have been introduced in this Congress and that 17 similar bills were introduced in the 85th Congress demonstrates the widespread realization that this 20 percent tax is unfair. It is one of very few excise taxes remaining at 20 percent. Most others have been reduced to 10 percent.

The principal reason why this has happened is, in my opinion, the failure to recognize that the term "cabaret tax" is a misnomer. It should be called a tax on musicians or on entertainment because it is applied in any establishment where music or entertainment or dancing is permitted in the same room where food is served.

This tax has long been unreasonably identified with the sale of liquor, even though it is collected in eating places where music is furnished but liquor by the glass is not sold. This is true in 11 States, namely, Arkansas, Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, and West Virginia.

Two basic considerations prompted me to introduce this bill: First, the favorable effect it would have on the economic welfare of a substantial number of our citizens and; second, it involves the principle of tax equality and fairness.

With respect to the first consideration, I invite your attention to the wealth of public testimony before the Subcommittee on Excise Taxes, of which I was chairman during the 85th Congress. This convincingly demonstrates that the 20-percent cabaret tax acts as a serious depressant to the entertainment industry and to those types of establishments that virtually are compelled to provide some form of entertainment in addition to dining and refreshment facilities, if they are to stay in business.

Public places that offer food or beverage along with refreshing diversion in the form of dancing, singing, music, and humor are traditional on the American scene. They comprise an integral and necessary part of the various entertainment facilities that provide the relaxation and amusement necessary for well-balanced living and should not be discouraged. It is evident, however, that this type of business has been discouraged by the cabaret tax. This is true not only of hotel dining rooms and supper clubs but applies as well to more modest establishments that cater to persons in the middle- and low-income groups.

The testimony presented during our hearings shows that this distressing condition has in turn accelerated the steady decline in the development of professional musicians, singers, and other entertainers. It has also eliminated the jobs of waiters, busboys, chefs, cooks, and other employees when dining rooms in many of the large hotels were forced to close because of the cabaret tax.

A survey conducted in 1955 by the Research Co. of America for the American Federation of Musicians revealed that from 1943, when the cabaret tax was raised from 5 percent to 20 percent, employment of musicians declined 50 percent.

The survey also showed that: First, average annual earnings of musicians was $3,043; second, that for every musician employed five to six other employees were needed in establishments where the cabaret tax applied; and third, owner-operators in 33 cities said that if the 20 percent tax was repealed it would result in an almost immediate gain of 63 percent in working hours of 41,000 musicians, increasing their earnings by about $2,000 a year.

Reducing the tax to 10 percent will mean employment for an additional 150,000 musicians, according to the American Federation of Musicians.

The magazine, Catering Industry Employees, after a check of 10 cities, from Boston to California, estimates 20,000 catering employees lost their jobs in the last 5 years because of establishments closed on account of the 20 percent tax. Hotel dining rooms, of which there were 700 in 1946, now number only 200. The closing of 500 such rooms is attributed to the 20 percent tax.

Legislative action surely is needed when a tax has such adverse consequences for thousands of our citizens. This need has been recognized by responsible officials of the present administration and, as an example, I cite a radio interview on May 29, 1957, when the Honorable James P. Mitchell, Secretary of Labor, expressed the view that the cabaret tax is discriminatory and should be repealed. With this particular view I wholeheartedly concur.

The cabaret tax is classed in the Internal Revenue Code under the general heading of admissions tax. Another category under this heading is the tax on general admissions, which was reduced by the 1954 act from a rate of 20 percent to 10 percent. Subsequently, congressional action provided an exemption of the first dollar from the tax on admissions.

By an earlier amendment to the law, establishments qualifying as ballrooms, dance halls, or similar establishments are excluded from the definition of places subject to the cabaret tax even though there is incidental selling of food and refreshments in conjunction with the operation.

These various actions have resulted in an incongruous situation. Payments for admission to a ballroom or dance hall, either are not taxed or are taxed at the 10 percent rate, depending on the charge, while payment by patrons for food and refreshments are not taxed at all. In contrast, an establishment where the selling of food and beverages is more than incidental, but which provides dancing facilities similar to that of a ballroom is subject to a tax of 20 percent on all receipts whether for admission, food or beverage.

If a person can afford to belong to a swanky club, he can take his wife, his family and his friends to dine and dance without having to pay the 20 percent cabaret tax, but if Bill Jones who can not afford club membership takes his wife out for dinner and a dance, he must pay the 20 percent tax. This is an obvious inequity.

The Treasury Department estimates that reducing this tax from 20 to 10 percent will result in a $21 million loss in revenue. I do not believe this will happen.

I maintain that this loss will be more than made up by an increase in revenue from the business taxes and the income taxes that will result from the increase in business and employment.

The record shows that the imposition of this tax at the 20 percent rate has decreased revenue. In 1946 the cabaret tax yielded $72 million. Today it is yielding only $43 million a year.

While many of us believe that repeal of the cabaret tax would be desirable, the Committee on Ways and Means concluded that repeal of the cabaret tax at this time, without repeal of some other excise taxes, would in a sense be discriminatory to those commodities and services which now enjoy the advantage of a lower rate. Therefore, the bill has been amended in committee to provide for a reduction in the rate of the tax to 10 percent. This would bring the cabaret tax in line with most other items in the Excise Tax Schedule. Although this action will not completely remedy the adverse economic effects referred to, it is anticipated that the partial relief will do much to relieve unemployment distress among musicians and entertainers, aid existing business and encourage the establishment and growth of new businesses.

This bill has the support of the American Federation of Musicians, the National Federation of Music Clubs, the American Hotel Association, the National Restaurant Association, and the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union.

I urge a favorable vote on this bill so that the beneficial results may be realized, and submit the following letters in support of this legislation:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS,
August 12, 1959.

HON. AIME J. FORAND,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORAND: The Federation of Musicians has made a quick spot check of typical cities and regions to document the continuing job losses for instrumentalists during the past 3- to 5-year period in which one segment of Congress has fiddled with the 20-percent excise tax while musicians fiddled rarely or not at all.

You will recall, and the records of the 84th and 85th Congresses will reflect in detail, that in 1955 the Research Co. of America reported to the American Federation of Musicians the findings of a national survey to determine the impact of the 20-percent excise on employment and business, that revealed:

1. Since 1943, the last year in which this tax was at 5 percent, that man-hours of employment available to musicians in establishments subject to the tax, have declined by more than 50 percent.

2. These job losses for musicians in places subject to the tax exceeded all other job losses since 1929, including the substantial unemployment attributable to technological change and the mechanization of music-making.

3. The surviving establishments subject to the 20-percent tax today still provide almost as many man-days of employment for musicians as all other sources combined. Thus, their business acceleration under tax repeal or relief constitute the single greatest area of potential reemployment and new employment for musicians.

4. The average earnings of musicians now employed in such establishments was, in 1954, only $3,042 per annum; thus, the musician is one of the most economically distressed of all American workingmen.

5. The survey of owner-operators in 33 cities revealed that repeal of the 20-percent tax would result in an almost immediate gain of 63 percent in working hours for 41,000 musicians, and thus increase their annual earnings by $2,000; up to 35 percent more musicians would be employed—a total employment gain of nearly 100 percent.

6. In the event of repeal, owner-operators testified they would expand operations and employ more musicians to the extent that $36 million more in Federal income taxes would flow to the Treasury. An added $16 million in Federal income taxes would derive, the survey showed, from longer hours of employment for musicians. These two normal tax accrual items alone balance off the cabaret tax revenues without taking into account a far greater excess of revenue that would accrue from widespread employment for other than musicians.

7. The survey statisticians estimated conservatively that for every musician reemployed there would be jobs created for from five to six entertainers, waiters, waitresses, bartenders, cooks, and other service help.

In summary, the economists told the Treasury and the Congress that some 250,000 jobs would be created through the repeal of the cabaret tax, which they described as a tax on employment.

Those were the findings up to 1955, truly a grotesque reflection of futile, nonproductive Federal taxing policy.

What has happened since 1955? The report is one of continuing and increasing blackout of employment.

The federation cannot, on short notice, venture a total estimate, but its spot check referred to in my opening paragraph is, we believe, both revealing and representative of the downward employment trend attributable directly to the 20-percent tax.

New York area: Our large New York City local reports that over the last 3 to 5 years approximately 1,000 jobs for musicians have been lost to this tax in New York City and Long Island. "To this total," the local reports—and I attach the telegram reporting these conditions—"should be added an additional figure, possibly even larger, where the tax has been a major deterrent to the opening of new establishments."

Los Angeles area: The federation's second largest local, in Los Angeles, documents in the attached telegram by name of establishment and number of musicians formerly employed the very current loss of some 188 music jobs in the metropolitan area. The report goes on to observe that "there are hundreds of other establishments" which it cannot list on short notice that have either closed or discontinued entertainment because of the 20-percent tax. It further notes that the California Tavern Owners Association says that outright repeal would make it possible for that industry to employ throughout the Nation "at least 100,000 more musicians and entertainers," and the association estimates that the resulting income tax and business tax accruals to the Federal Treasury "would be far greater than the 20-percent tax now being collected."

Cleveland area: Our local in Cleveland reports: "In last 2 years the Vogue Room in Hollenden Hotel has closed. Cleveland Hotel's Bronze Room has cut back to five musicians. A large theater restaurant that employed 15 musicians has gone into bankruptcy. Hotel Statler's Terrace Room will employ no musicians this fall. All employers insist that the major factor contributing to the present status is ever-increasing customer resistance to 20-percent tax. In addition, many small neighborhood nightclubs have discontinued music for the same reason."

Boston area: The federation's Boston local No. 9 reports loss of 300 music jobs and the closing of 30 establishments in the last 5 years due to the tax.

San Francisco area: San Francisco local reports that within the last year 40 entertainment places in that area have either closed or discontinued their entertainment, affecting a conservatively estimated 120 jobs for instrumental musicians alone.

Albuquerque, N. Mex., area: Twenty-five musicians would have had employment in hotels of this medium-sized southwest city over the last 5 years except for the 20-percent tax that has prompted hotelmen there to avoid entertainment that is taxable at the prohibitive rate.

San Diego area: "Employment of our members in the San Diego area," our federation local there reports in the attached telegram, "has been seriously curtailed due to 20-percent tax. Club Royal, formerly employing five musicians and singer 7 nights weekly, now using jukebox only. Aloah Cafe, formerly employing three musicians 6 nights, now has jukebox only. Paris Inn was using two 5-piece bands and a floor show, now closed. Skippers, Twin Inn, Club Romance, Shermandine Clubs, and Pacific and Dance Ballrooms, with potential of 25 musicians, are now dark, and other places have cut live music from 6 nights a week to from 1 to 2 nights, with jukebox music only during most nights. Relief under this tax would open many places in this area where employment for our members is critical."

Pittsburgh area: In response to questionnaires sent to owners of entertainment establishments in this area, somewhat more than half are subject to the 20 percent tax, but the days and hours of employment for musicians and other entertainers, as well as total job opportunities are dwindling progressively, the Pittsburgh local reports. An interesting phase of this survey revealed that if the tax was eliminated owners-operators of entertainment places said they would employ 43 percent more musicians.

Philadelphia area: Of the more than 5,000 members of the Federation of Musicians in Philadelphia more than one-half are forced to seek subsidiary employment in nonmusical occupations, a survey shows. Of the total of regularly employed musicians more than half are dependent upon establishments subject to the 20 percent tax and these job opportunities have diminished sharply in the last 3 to 5 years, our Philadelphia local reports.

Cincinnati area: Within the past year, the federation's Cincinnati local reports, two clubs subject to the 20 percent tax have gone out of business, and another discontinued its entertainment policy, denying employment to 14 musicians and 3 entertainers, as well as numerous culinary and service help. Formerly six first class hotels in the area employed bands. These employment opportunities have now dwindled to seven pianists.

Seattle area: In a single Seattle hotel, the Olympic, a music payroll of $1,000 a week giving 8 to 10 instrumentalists regular employment, has been revised downward as a direct result of the 20 percent tax, so that today only two pianists and no other entertainers are employed, the Seattle local reports.

I shall have by August 17 additional area spot checks on dwindling employment for musicians attributable directly to the 20 percent tax and shall place them in your hands as addenda to this letter report:

Chicago metropolitan area: The Chicago local, third largest of the federation's 700 locals, reports currently on the closing or elimination of entertainment policies in 26 establishments which were or are subject to the 20-percent excise tax. Employment for 98 instrumentalists alone was denied as a direct result of customer resistance to the excise. Attached is the telegraphic documentation, listing names of establishments and number of musicians formerly employed, as received this date from the recording secretary of Chicago Local 10, American Federation of Musicians.

Milwaukee area: Twenty-five establishments have discontinued entertainment because of customer resistance to the 20-percent tax. These places once provided a total annual payroll of $520,000 for instrumentalists alone. Our Milwaukee local (letter attached) reports that 30 additional establishments have indicated the desire and intent to employ musicians from 2 to 4 nights per week if the tax is discontinued, representing an additional annual payroll loss of $78,000 for instrumentalists. Thus, the Milwaukee local points to a combined loss of $598,000 per annum in employment per year for the last 5 years which it attributes directly to the excise tax.

Cleveland area: One major hotel in Cleveland has closed out its music completely because of the 20-percent tax. Two other major hotels do not use music part of the year because of the tax. In addition, there are at least 40 nightclubs which have discontinued music because the tax has created a burden under which they were no longer able to operate.

Meanwhile, I have been informed by the American Guild of Variety Artists that it will shortly send to you certain documented information reflecting a virtual wholesale closing of entertainment places across the Nation because of growing customer resistance to this possible 20-percent excise.

With all good wishes and kindest personal regards, I am,

Cordially,

HAL LEYSHON,
Executive Director.

AMERICAN HOTEL ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., August 17, 1959.
Hon. AIME J. FORAND,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. FORAND: Following our pleasant meeting with you a week or 10 days ago, I made a quick canvass of some of the key cities in the United States, in an effort to learn the identity of some of the hotels which had closed entertainment rooms in the last year or two.

The attached statement gives a partial list of such hotels. Without doubt, the closing of these rooms, due to guest resistance to the 20 percent cabaret tax, caused the loss of thousands of jobs for waiters, waitresses, entertainers, musicians, etc.

We have every reason to believe that the enactment of your bill, H.R. 2164, reducing the tax to 10 percent, would bring about the prompt reopening of many of these rooms.

Cordially,

M. O. RYAN.

ENTERTAINMENT ROOMS CLOSED

NEW YORK

Starlight Roof, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel; Cafe Rouge, Statler Hilton Hotel: These two are among the entertainment rooms in New York City hotels which closed during the past year.

SEATTLE

The Olympic Bowl, Olympic Hotel: The outstanding entertainment room in any of the hotels in Seattle, closed last winter. It had closed once before, but was reopened a second time, and a vigorous attempt was made to make it successful. But the public simply would not pay the 20 percent tax on food and beverage, so it was closed permanently.

ST. LOUIS

The Zodiac Room, Chase Hotel: Closed last week (Aug. 6).

Town and Country, Congress Hotel: Discontinued music and dancing last summer. Room continues open for the service of beverage and food, but no tax is applicable.

Terrace Room, Statler Hilton: This main dining room in the leading hotel of the city discontinued music and dancing a year or two ago. It now is only open for the service of food at noon each day.

Boulevard Room, Sheraton-Jefferson Hotel: This room formerly had stage shows and dancing. These were discontinued in March 1959. Only luncheon is now served.

Gourmet Room, Park Plaza Hotel: This room formerly offered stage shows and dancing, and remained open until 2 a.m. However, all entertainment and dancing were discontinued, and the room now closes at 9 p.m., following the service of dinner.

KANSAS CITY

Terrace Grill, Hotel Muehlebach: After 40 years of continuous operation, this room was closed in June 1959. It regularly employed more than 50 persons, all of whom lost their jobs when the room closed. Throughout that section of the country, it was known as the leading room for entertainment and dancing.

The Tropics, Hotel Phillips: Dancing was terminated in this room a year ago, and it now affords only food and beverage service.

Penguin Room, Hotel Continental: This dining and dancing room was closed early in 1958, and there are no plans for reopening it, so long as the cabaret tax remains at 20 percent.

The Casbah, Hotel Bellerive: This popular entertainment room closed last year.

The Branding Iron, Hotel LaSalle: This dining and dancing room was closed early this year.

ROCHESTER, MINN.

Royal Coach Room, Kahler Corp. hotels: Due to public resistance to cabaret tax, this room was closed recently.

CHICAGO

Terrace Casino, Morrison Hotel; College Inn, Sherman Hotel; Marine Room, Edgewater Beach Hotel; Gold Coast Room, Drake Hotel; Glass Hat, Pick-Congress Hotel; Mayfair Room, Sheraton-Blackston Hotel; Walnut Room, Bismarck Hotel: All of these rooms have been closed during the last 2 or 3 years. In the Drake and in the Edgewater Beach, smaller rooms have been established wherein periodic dancing and entertainment are offered, but they are not open 6 nights a week, as were the former entertainment rooms.

LOS ANGELES

Biltmore Bowl, Biltmore Hotel: One of the most famous entertainment rooms on the continent, the Biltmore Bowl was forced to close a year ago, due to declining public patronage.

NATIONAL RESTAURANT ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., August 14, 1959.
Congressman AIME J. FORAND,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORAND: On behalf of the National Restaurant Association and the approximately 80,000 restaurants it represents through its affiliated State restaurant associations, I wish to express our gratitude for your very excellent efforts to eliminate or reduce the burdensome cabaret tax.

At our meeting in your office on Tuesday, August 4, you requested up-to-date figures which might be helpful to you when H.R. 2164 reaches the House floor. I regret to advise that we do not have any valid statistical information which would indicate employment or sales potential should this burdensome tax be eliminated or reduced. The effect of reducing or eliminating this tax from an economic standpoint, however, should be obvious when consideration is given to some of the economic factors affecting the restaurant industry. The average profit nationally for the restaurant industry is 2 percent. Restaurants, like food stores, operate successfully through a large volume of sales. In this type of industry, price has a tremendous effect on sales. Obviously any increase in price would result in such a curtailment of sales that any corresponding increase in profits would be more than offset by a loss in sales. Were this not the case, management could raise prices but 2 percent and thereby double profits.

The cabaret tax increases prices 20 percent where it is applied. This oppressive tax does not result in the complete elimination of that business to which it is applied (although it comes close to it) simply because the cabaret tax is applied equally to all competition in the business. In the restaurant industry, however, competition is primarily with the housewife and her family budget. Consequently any increased cost like that brought about by a 20 percent cabaret tax will obviously result in a far greater curtailment of sales in the restaurant industry than if the tax were applied to a food or service where no alternative is available. From the standpoint of production of Federal revenue alone, without regard to justice, any creditable economist would advise against such an oppressive tax. Theoretically at least a 50-percent reduction of the cabaret tax should produce more revenue in cabaret taxes alone than the present levy of 20 percent. It is our considered opinion that sales subject to Federal cabaret taxes might easily double if the tax is reduced 50 percent.

Such has been our experience in the restaurant industry and such is a contention which we believe will be supported by many competent economists familiar with restaurant industry sales. At any rate, no competent economist would advise such a high tax on a service for which there is such a readily available substitute, produced by an industry which depends on a large volume of sales, and which experience a relatively small percentage of sales as profit. In our judgment, the only economic justification for the tax is to discourage the activity to which it is applied. Perhaps this was a good end during the war years when it was initiated. It does not justify its continuation at this time.

Most assuredly the production of Federal revenue has never been a sound economic justification for this tax, and it certainly is not an economic justification for its continuance or for the refusal to reduce it. In our judgment, the cabaret tax was initially applied and subsequently increased accidentally during war periods during which there was a substantial upsurge in the activity to which it was applied and consequently its crushing effect on sales has never been truly appreciated. If we were in a position to advise management to reduce an arbitrary 20-percent additional charge to 10 percent under like circumstances for the purpose of increasing sales, we most assuredly would. We think that Congress can and should find just as much economic justification for a 50-percent reduction in cabaret taxes without in any way fearing a loss in Federal revenue from cabaret taxes alone.

There are some, we are certain, that would continue cabaret taxes not for economic reasons but rather to discourage the activity to which the tax is applied. Historically the tax has been unreasonably identified with the sale of liquor. It is not realistically or economically designed to affect liquor sales. If such a tax were desirable, it would be more economically sound to apply it directly as an addition to excises presently levied on all liquor. There are 11 States, as you know, where cabaret taxes operate on sale of food alone. If anything, this tax encourages the consumption of liquor at other establishments, at private parties, or at home where its cost is considerably less than at establishments where the cost of providing dancing, music, and entertainment must be added to the price of the liquor and food sold.

Cordially yours,

THOMAS W. POWER,
Washington Representative.

AMERICAN GUILD OF VARIETY ARTISTS,
New York, N.Y., August 13, 1959.
Representative AIME J. FORAND,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORAND: I am taking the liberty of writing to you, relative to the 20-percent Federal amusement tax. I have been heartened by recent reports in the public press indicating that the bill has a possibility of being reduced to 10 percent. While I personally feel the theatrical industry would be in a far better position, employmentwise, if the tax was abolished completely, I am not that naive not to understand that half a loaf is better than none.

I am enclosing for your information, which you may feel free to use at your discretion, a list of the establishments that have closed due to a lack of business. In 90 percent of the instances, the lack of business is definitely and mainly attributed to the fact that the general overall public cannot subscribe to any form of entertainment which proves to be in excess of their earning capacity. For example: The average income earner going to a nightclub as a couple, would necessitate the spending of some $30 or more in order to have an evening's entertainment. Certainly, in light of present earning capacities, this is totally far from being realistic. The average night club or supper club will charge anywhere from $15 to $20 for dinner for two, excluding beverages, plus the 20-percent tax. Yes, and in some cities there are local as well as additional State taxes to be added. In some cities, coupled with the 20-percent tax there is an additional 8-percent tax—3 percent city and 5 percent State. Twenty-eight percent, on top of your already proffered bill for the evening, is an exorbitant amount of money for anyone to pay. This does not include the babysitter, the parking of car, or other means of transportation plus gratuities.

The elimination of the 20-percent tax, or even its reduction to 10 percent, I am quite confident, will inure to the benefit of the U.S. Government and to its citizenry. Our union, the American Guild of Variety Artists, which represents the variety performer in nightclubs, vaudeville theaters, parks, expositions, ice shows, water shows, skating shows, and industrial shows of all types has been one of the hardest hit by the 20-percent tax these many years. The American Federation of Musicians has been hit even harder than we have because of their greater membership. The stagehands, the catering employees, the press agents union, and all of the other crafts that go to service nightclubs and other areas of entertainment which I have enumerated above, have been greatly hurt to the extent where avenues of employment for all of our members have decreased to a practical standstill. Our union requires that all employers desirous of hiring our members place a bond in escrow with us in a non-interest-bearing account in the amount of 1 week's salary for each performer employed.

I am enclosing for your information and perusal a list of over 250 establishments that have been forced to shut their doors in every part of the United States as well as Canada and Hawaii, where our union has jurisdiction. You will note that I have had this information arranged as follows: Name of the establishment, city, the date when entertainment was discontinued and the amount of money which we returned to that establishment. This covers the year of 1958. The year 1959, which has yet to terminate, is even worse. The combined amount of money we have returned in the form of 1 week's salary is $182,994.02. Mind you, sir, this is 1 week's salary. The monthly salary would come to $731,976.08. The yearly salary, if these places were still open, would have been approximately $8,783,701.96. This does not include the salaries for musicians, stagehands, public relations, culinary and catering help, etc.

If relief is not forthcoming this time, I shudder to think what the future holds in store for all those connected with the theatrical profession.

Your help and understanding, support and aid is appreciated and welcomed. We would like you to know, sir, that our entire membership of over 20,000 performers is most grateful for all that you have done to bring this to pass. We shall never forget your kindnesses and considerations, not only in our behalf, but in behalf of the entertainment industry. No matter what the outcome, please rest assured of our genuine thanks for your complete cooperation.

If we can be of any further service to you, please do not hesitate to call on us.

With every good wish, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JACKIE BRIGHT,
National Administrative Secretary.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF MUSIC CLUBS,
Canton, Pa., July 27, 1959.

Re cabaret tax repeal.

To Members of the House Ways and Means Committee.

MY DEAR SIR: This is to respectfully request your immediate consideration and favorable action on bills H.R. 2164 (Forand) and H.R. 8010 (Mason). This request comes not alone from me personally, but the National Federation of Music Clubs, a philanthropic music service organization of some 600,000 members from across the nation.

It is for these reasons:

1. Our talented American musicians are being denied employment, not only because of technological development—a change in entertainment habits—but by the cabaret tax, which is taxing out of existence many establishments which employ musicians.

2. This is discouraging the development of our musical talent and a greater musical and cultured country.

3. This is discrimination against musicians and art.

A country is known by its art as well as its science; let us keep them in balance for a great cultured nation.

Thank you in advance for your consideration and support.

Very truly yours,

MRS. C. ARTHUR BULLOCK.

AUGUST 15, 1959.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FORAND: President Ed S. Miller, of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, who is in Holmes Hospital, Cincinnati, recovering from chest surgery, has asked me to send you his heartfelt thanks for your unflagging interest in getting action on reduction of the cabaret tax. It's a goal of greatest importance to our members, as you can readily understand.

At Miller's request I queried locals in 10 cities on the jobs the tax has cost. The replies to my wire are attached. Figures cited in the attached are based on these messages.

At the same time, Miller asked that I tell you our best guess as to jobs likely to be restored or created nationwide. Repeal, we think, would yield 250,000; adoption of H.R. 2164 about 150,000.

Best wishes,

FREDERICK B. SWEET,
Managing Editor.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORAND. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to congratulate the gentleman on the fine statement he has made and I concur with his remarks. Recently I had some substantial businessmen in my area, visiting here in Washington, come to my office. They are in the cigarette vending machine business. During your remarks you made mention that the cabaret tax applied to food and beverages. I have been informed by the vending machine business people of my area that the Internal Revenue Service is attempting to collect a cabaret tax on cigarettes that are sold in vending machines. It is my opinion that such sales have no connection with the activities that make an establishment a cabaret. The sales are through machines only, and neither employees of the cabarets, nor concession-aires are involved. The independent lessee has no connection with activities which make an establishment either a full-time or a part-time cabaret. In cases of those establishments which operate as cabarets only at certain times, it is impossible to regulate the machine to charge different prices at different times; it is impossible to identify sales made during the cabaret period, and it is impossible to pass on the tax to the purchaser. For some time now, the cigarette vending machine lessees have been operating under the position that they are not taxable. To rule at this time that the 20-percent cabaret tax applies would be a crippling blow to the industry, and would work a most unjust hardship in that all machines would have to be removed from any location that is at any time a cabaret. Further, to rule that the tax must be applied retroactively would amount to a confiscatory assessment.

Has your committee undertaken any study in regard to this matter, or has the point been brought before you? Do you believe that this tax is just for food and beverages, or has your committee in any way formed any kind of an opinion as to whether cigarettes sold in vending machines should be subject to the cabaret tax?

Mr. FORAND. I will tell you this, that I have personally had complaints, and I have asked the Internal Revenue Service to look into it. But, our chairman is familiar with that question, and if he desires to answer it, I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. The Service is looking into this very point at the request of all of us. They have not as yet reported back. They expect to report back very shortly.

Mr. O'NEILL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in urging support of this legislation which came unanimously from the Committee on Ways and Means, I do want to pay tribute to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND] and other Members who have sponsored legislation having a similar purpose. This legislation has been before the Congress in the past but, for one circumstance or another, the legislation has failed of final passage. I respect the perseverance and the ability of the sponsors of this proposal and hope that this time they will be successful in having a law result from this legislation.

As we look into the future, keeping in mind the great growth of this Nation of ours, and as we tell our constituents we want tax reduction, I am persuaded to suggest that one of the things we should strive for in addition to tax reduction is sound tax adjustment as being a goal for which we should hope. In other words, I think as our country is growing and as our expenses are mounting, it is possible that the take from the American taxpayer will not be greatly reduced in the years ahead. The bill now before us illustrates this principle. On the other hand, it is unquestioned that by wise adjustment in certain of our tax areas we will get more money out of the taxpaying public at lower rates. I can think now of a number of areas, and I will cite one, where, for example, the 90-percent income tax level might apply, and where the individual taxpayer, for one reason or another, does not care to earn additional dollars if he could retain only 10 to 15 cents out of each dollar earned; where it would seem to me that a wise tax adjustment would lower those excessive and exceedingly high rates to a lower rate, inducing that worker to earn more money and thereby pay more taxes.

I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation now before this body would do just that; namely, increase the revenue from the American taxpaying public and reduce the rates under which that revenue is paid. Let us take an industry which is adversely affected by the present tax rate. If we lessen the rate, we provide more jobs and in the long run get more money from those who are employed.

I repeat what I said earlier that as we look into the future I am persuaded that we will be able to find many areas in the tax field where we can, by wisely adjusting the tax rates, increase the opportunity for employment and improve the capital structure of our country. In short, we would be acting to provide jobs, raise higher taxes at lower rates, as a result of making more employment so that our workers will have better jobs at higher wages.

Mr. Speaker, in the bill, H.R. 2164, the House has before it legislation that has been approved by the membership of the House on two previous occasions. The bill has as its purpose, as amended by the Committee on Ways and Means, the reduction from 20 percent to 10 percent of the so-called cabaret tax. It will be recalled during the 83d Congress that the House in acting on the Excise Tax Reduction Act of 1954 approved a provision which would have reduced the cabaret tax to 10 percent. This action was taken in recognition of the fact that the 20-percent rate depresses employment opportunities among musicians and the other employment undertakings involved in the operation and servicing of restaurants providing entertainment for their customers. It is to be regretted that this change was deleted in the other body. In the 85th Congress similar legislation passed the House, H.R. 17, but received no consideration beyond that point.

This legislation was unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. It is my expectation that a reduction of this tax will considerably improve the employment opportunities in the entertainment industry and that any revenue loss that is occasioned by this excise tax reduction will be substantially offset by revenue gain from the income taxes arising from the increased employment.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. This is the third time this matter will have been voted on by the House. We provided in 1954 in legislation passed by the House for a reduction of this cabaret tax from 20 percent to 10 percent. We again passed legislation to accomplish that objective in 1957. It is here with us again today. It would be my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this time another body that also has something to say about it will concur in the judgment expressed by the House on these several occasions.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on one thing; that is, that I think the name of this tax, the so-called cabaret tax, is a misnomer. Fundamentally this is a tax on employment, a tax on the employment of a particular group of our people, people who are professional entertainers or musicians. In fact it can apply even though the entertainers happen to be amateurs.

There are too many people who have the idea that this is just a tax on someone who may operate a nightclub or who sells liquor. Basically this tax applies only when entertainers are hired and entertainment is provided in connection with the serving of food and beverages. If there was ever a tax that is unjustified in times like these, it is a tax on employment, no matter what group of our people is involved. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I have favored and I would favor the complete repeal of the tax. I find it very difficult in my own mind to justify going only halfway in this matter. In fact, I have introduced legislation for several years now—in this Congress it is H.R. 331—which would repeal the tax completely.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the remarks made by my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES], that this is actually a tax on employment. I know that my own area in New York is very adversely affected, in that the employment of the very people the gentleman has mentioned is adversely affected. I also agree with the gentleman that the best thing we could do would be to eliminate this tax entirely. It is not helping industry generally.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. I am not going to suggest, however, that I would oppose this particular action. If I cannot get the whole loaf, I am willing to take a half loaf.

Mr. Speaker, there is probably some justification for the feeling that perhaps this is as far as we should go at this time in view of what we have had to face in the other body. Maybe a full repealer would run into even greater difficulty there. So I am not criticizing the gentlemen who propose simply a reduction of the tax to 10 percent from 20 percent. But I am suggesting that this tax, even 1 percent of it, in my judgment, is an unjustifiable tax and we should look to the day when we can repeal this tax completely. We should take this partial step today, but then our next step should be, as soon as it is practically possible, to eliminate the entire tax.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 2164. I introduced a bill to repeal the cabaret tax in both the 85th Congress and in this 86th Congress. This tax has caused a loss of employment to many waitresses, musicians, and other employees. It is an unfair and inequitable tax. It should be repealed entirely. However, the bill, H.R. 2164, is at least a step in the right direction, as it reduces the tax from 20 percent to 10 percent. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] in the statements they have both made. I agree with the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin that there is ample justification for removing this tax in full. And I would hope that that could ultimately be accomplished.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I am going to dwell on another matter for just one moment. Twenty years ago this day, almost to this hour, our time, German bombers moved from Berlin and bombed the open city of Warsaw, Poland, beginning the bloodiest war ever known to mankind. I left Poland together with some of my colleagues, Mr. ADAIR, Mr. MONTOYA, and Mr. SAUND—all of whom I see on the floor—the day before yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, several of our colleagues, Mr. POAGE, Mr. MACHROWICZ, Mr. DERWINSKI, and the others that I have mentioned, distinguished themselves in a way that I feel should be brought to the attention of this body at the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union in Warsaw, which is still in progress. Mr. MACHROWICZ, my old friend and able colleague, opened the meeting as our first speaker.

Speaking in the ancient language of the brave Polish people, he told them that he, himself, was a native of Poland, born in that country, with many of the members of his family still living there; that he had served as an officer in their army during World War I. From there on, he talked about the events of 1939 and the cynical pact between Hitler and Stalin which made it possible for him to march into undefended Poland and then permitted the Russians to march in to grab their share of the loot 2 weeks thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, it would have gratified every Member of this body, if each and every one of you could have seen the spontaneous reaction of the people of Poland to that speech by one of the fine and able Members of this great body. They literally acclaimed him everywhere in Warsaw, and by the time we left there, he, in a sense, had become a new hero of a great and distinguished country.

Mr. Speaker, I say that the spark of freedom still burns very, very deeply and very strongly in the bosom of every person who calls himself a Pole. The demonstrations in behalf of Vice President NIXON were real and genuine and were not promoted by anyone, in contrast to that for Mr. Khrushchev who had been there only a few weeks before and for whose visit a holiday had been declared. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, we would preserve among ourselves a firm affection for the people of this great nation who are striving desperately despite their Communist masters to regain their freedom.

Twenty years ago they lost thousands upon thousands in Warsaw and ultimately 6 million people in their small nation. Here is a country that looks with affection and devotion to the United States of America. We must remember that.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the remarks of my colleagues of the Committee on Ways and Means in support of this remedial legislation. I think the point has been well made that this tax is a misnomer and therefore a tax to which it has been difficult to bring sense. This is, indeed, a tax on employment. The only point I want to emphasize further and, in fact, bring out is this point of the revenue aspect of this tax. I happen to believe this is an example, and a very good example, of how a tax rate can get beyond the point of diminishing return. I am satisfied that if we reduce this tax from 20 percent to 10 percent, we actually will see more revenue collected in the ensuing years beginning in about 2 years, I would say, than we presently collect under the 20-percent rate.

If we do no more than establish this factor in the minds of the Treasury Department and others, that there is such a thing as a point of diminishing returns in tax rates, we will have achieved real advancement in fiscal consideration.

One final thing, and that is to disabuse the minds—and I hope they have already been disabused—that this in any sense has anything to do with the serving of liquor, because there are some States where liquor is not permitted to be served, yet the cabaret tax applies.

In the finest hotels and the finest restaurants in the country, whether liquor is served or not, the fact that food is served and there is entertainment means that the tax applies. It is indeed a tax on employment and has really worked a hardship on our people who are in the field of music and entertainment.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK].

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the repeal of the cabaret tax. If taxes are to be reduced this should be one of the least important areas to command the attention of Congress.

My fear is that this tax reduction will not create or save a single job. The tax loss to the Government will simply end up as a profit gain for the cabaret operator with no advantage to the citizen.

If the present 20-percent cabaret tax is a depressant to the cabaret business, it is no more a depressant than most carbarets.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks made a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] about the work done in the Warsaw Interparliamentary Conference by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACHROWICZ], and in fact by the other members of the delegation as well, including the gentleman himself. It was excellent.

I think it is worthwhile also to note that we had another Member of this House who spoke the Polish language, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DERWINSKI]. He, too, contributed a great deal to the constructive activity of this Conference. Certainly it was the feeling of all of us who were there that our colleagues, and particularly those who speak the language of the host country, are doing a great deal to assure respect for our views and to further the cause of democracy.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY].

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of suspension of the rules on H.R. 2164, and urge that the House pass this legislation, which would reduce the so-called 20-percent cabaret tax to 10 percent.

Three times the House in its wisdom has seen fit to pass legislation reducing this discriminatory tax, and three times the Senate unfortunately has not seen fit to concur. It is my sincere hope that in this 86th Congress, history will not again repeat itself and this onerous tax, which in effect substantiates the law of diminishing returns, will at least be cut in half.

For my own part, I would have preferred outright repeal to modification at this time. Reams of testimony of unimpeachable source have been presented to the Ways and Means Committee, to the point where it would be impossible to offer further evidence that would not in itself be repetitious. Suffice to say that the overwhelming weight of evidence supports the fact beyond any doubt that a substantial reduction or elimination of this tax would result in no monetary loss to the Treasury, but rather on the basis of objective statistical research would increase revenue, not to mention the reemployment of thousands of presently unemployed or part-time-employed musicians, in addition to substantially increasing employment in related crafts such as waiters, culinary workers, entertainers, and so forth.

As a classic example of the effect this tax has in just one case with which I am personally acquainted, I should like to include the text of two telegrams which I received recently from my own district in Seattle. One is from the manager of the Olympic Hotel in Seattle, Wash., one of the leading luxury hotels in the Northwest, Mr. Thomas A. Gildersleve, and states:

Information for your use in connection with H.R. 2164. Reopened Olympic Bowl March 1958, closed October 1, 1958, after experiencing substantial loss mainly due to opposition to cabaret tax, Federal, State, and city, which amounted to a total of 26⅓ percent. Also keen competition from clubs such as the large operation on Eighth Avenue which are not subject to Federal taxes. Bowl had 27 employees including manager, captains, waitresses, busboys, plus entertainment cost including music approximately $1,000 per week. I am certain that a reduction or elimination of the cabaret tax would be a great help to the restaurant and hotel industries.

The second telegram is from the Secretary of local 76, American Federation of Musicians of Seattle, Wash., Mr. L. D. "Larry" McDonell, stating:

We earnestly solicit your support and vote for H.R. 2164, a bill seeking reduction of the 20-percent job-destroying tax. We firmly believe this tax is responsible for a large percentage of unemployment not only in our ranks but in other affiliated crafts as well. The Olympic Bowl and the Georgian Room of the Olympic Hotel are a concrete example. At one time these rooms employed 8- to 10-piece orchestras nightly as well as waiters, waitresses and bartenders. Today they are closed because the public will not absorb the tax. The resultant loss in wages to our members alone amounts to well over $1,000 per week. This is one case of many here in Seattle. Multiply this by the number of similar cases over the entire United States and the resultant loss is a staggering sum.

These telegrams in themselves are relatively unimportant in the overall picture, but multiplied a thousandfold as they are, they represent the death throe of a dying industry.

I urge the passage of this legislation.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the gentleman from Rhode Island. I am surprised by the unusualness of the report accompanying this bill. Nowhere do I find a single line or word representing the sentiment or the views of any of the executive agencies with respect to this bill.

This is probably the first report of its kind in this session of Congress. Can the gentleman tell me the reaction of the administrative agencies of Government regarding this loss of $21 million of revenue?

Mr. FORAND. I said during my remarks that the Treasury estimates a loss of $21 million. For that reason the Treasury is opposed to it. I deny that there will be any such loss. I maintain that we are going to pick up more than the $21 million that will be lost as the result of this reduction.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further comment?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I might remind the gentleman from Rhode Island too that the reduction of this tax will result in increased employment and that will probably result in a greater increase in revenue.

Mr. GROSS. There is no word from the Bureau of the Budget or any agency of Government. I am surprised that there is nothing contained in this report.

Mr. FORAND. I will say to the gentleman that personally I do not care about a report from any of the agencies. We are the ones responsible for the action we take here.

Mr. GROSS. I will say to the gentleman that we are wasting a lot of paper and time of employees if the reports from the executive branch of the Government on other bills are unworthy of consideration; we are wasting a lot of paper, time, and pay of employees in preparing the reports and so on, and so forth.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. Yes, I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORAND. Has the gentleman ever found himself in the position of requesting a report from an agency and failing to get it?

Mr. GROSS. Yes, and I will say to the gentleman that I am not always bound by what the various agencies of the Government have to say with respect to a bill, but I like to have their views and I am surprised that there are none for or against this bill.

Mr. FORAND. I, too, like to have their views, but I am opposed to their method of vetoing consideration of a bill by refusing to turn in a report or give the committee their views, and that has happened time and time and time again during my service here, particularly since I have been a member of the Ways and Means Committee, the last 17 years.

I have reached the point where I am not going to be disturbed by their efforts to veto a piece of legislation by not sending in their report. We ask for reports in ample time on all these bills. As soon as the bill is introduced before our committee a report is immediately requested. In fact, only about 2 weeks ago in a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee in this little room P–15, I made the statement that I was ready to offer a resolution providing that if an agency failed to make a report within 90 days of the time they were requested to make it, we would assume they were in favor and go ahead with consideration of the legislation. That is the answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. GROSS. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK]. I do not believe this is the place to start cutting taxes. If we are going to cut taxes I think a better place to start would be on luggage and many other items which are in common usage.

Mr. FORAND. We are bringing this cabaret tax down to the same level as other excise taxes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KLUCZYNSKI].

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman from Rhode Island for making it possible for us to vote on this very important legislation today, and I want to praise the Ways and Means Committee for approving this measure.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEOGH. I am delighted to join with the gentleman from Illinois. I find it much more comfortable being on his side than against him.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. FORAND, for the diligence with which he has pursued the objective of this bill. The tax he has sought to be reduced is a graphic example of the retrogressive nature of excise taxes imposed at an unduly high rate. While it is termed "cabaret," we know that that term does not mean what was thought in the mauve and other decades. The tax rate imposes restrictions on the operation by responsible hotels and dining places of entertainment of a high quality. The enactment of this bill would, in the opinion of those sponsoring it and in my opinion, do much to increase the employment of musicians and other artists who are unduly burdened by the tax. The enactment of the pending bill will leave only one other admissions tax of 20 percent; namely, the admissions tax imposed on racetracks. Regardless of our feelings with respect to the industries here involved, it is obviously unfair unduly to impose on otherwise lawful enterprises burdensome taxes. I trust this bill will be enacted, and I further hope that our Committee on Ways and Means will before long undertake a comprehensive review of our existing excise structures to eliminate any that are unduly burdensome or an economic hindrance to the development of legitimate enterprises.

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York. I am sorry, I regret my opposition to his amendment last week, but of course I was endeavoring to protect the interests of Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry this bill has been misnamed "a cabaret tax." It is, in fact really an entertainment tax. To be sure although this tax is levied where liquor is sold in a cabaret, it is also a tax on the finest hotels and restaurant establishments where orchestrations are given throughout the Nation.

Some years ago we had an orchestra performing at my restaurant, where family gatherings of Polish people danced Polish dances. But the tax discouraged a continuation of this music program of entertainment. This bill would stimulate the employment of more people, including musicians, cooks, waiters, waitresses, busboys, bartenders, and so forth. Businessmen would return to their former music programs for the entertainment of their customers. It is estimated that 60,000 men and women would be reemployed in this field if the 20-percent tax were reduced to 10 percent.

I am sure the House will vote in favor of this bill today. However, to transgress a moment while I am on my feet—we fans in Chicago have been waiting for 40 years for something to happen. It certainly happened on Sunday afternoon in Cleveland. So I want to invite all of you to Chicago where the world's series will be played this year.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to join the many other commendations of the gentleman from Rhode Island, Congressman FORAND, for his fine work in bring to the floor H.R. 2164, the bill to reduce the cabaret tax from 20 to 10 percent. This bill goes a long way toward eliminating the tax inequity which has plagued restaurants, banquet halls, cabarets, roofgardens, and other places where entertainment is furnished in connection with the serving of food or merchandise.

I was pleased to join as a cosponsor of legislation to repeal the tax entirely as was provided for in H.R. 2164 when introduced by Congressman FORAND. The purpose was to enable cabarets and similar places of "live" entertainment to survive against the public reluctance to pay the tax and to compete against the vast mechanical entertainment industry which has expanded so tremendously in the last 10 years.

The 20-percent tax was, in effect, a toll on musicians and entertainers, on waiters and other employees of such places of entertainment, although it was supposed to be assessed against patrons. The diminution of trade at cabarets and other places of entertainment has meant the loss of countless jobs and the means of livelihood for musicians and other entertainers—not to mention the other employees of such establishments. And the continuation of the tax is jeopardizing the livelihood of many who are currently employed.

Although I would prefer to see the tax repealed in its entirety, I am very pleased that H.R. 2164 has been reported out for action today. It certainly is a step forward. If its passage serves to revive an important segment of the "live" entertainment industry, it is quite possible that the increase in business will produce a tax revenue under the new formula that will more than offset the $21 million which it is estimated will be lost in excise tax collections as a result of the passage of this bill.

It is only just that the cabaret industry not be taxed at a higher rate than that imposed by other excise taxes. The passage of H.R. 2164 will help to remedy an undeniable need. I urge that it be supported by all Members of the House.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I support this measure and sincerely hope there will be sufficient votes here this afternoon to suspend the rules and pass it and bring relief to the entertainment industry which has suffered a great deal under the weight of an unfair tax.

I believe the reduction in this tax will result in increased employment for musicians and entertainers as well as for employees in hotels, restaurants and cafes throughout the country.

The consumer will benefit in a 10 percent reduction in his food bill in those dining establishments which provide entertainment.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support H.R. 2164, unanimously recommended for passage by the Committee on Ways and Means. The report accompanying the bill clearly explains the patent inequity in this tax, constituting as it does an exception to the standard 10 percent rate on ad valorem excise taxes.

But the most telling point, in my judgment, is the fact that the tax has severely injured the entertainment industry. This is brought out in a paragraph in the report which deserves to be read into the RECORD:

> In recent years the employment of musicians and entertainers as a class has been at a relatively low level as a result of the drastic technological changes which have occurred in the entertainment business. The decline in employment, begun with the passing of the silent movies and vaudeville in the early thirties, has continued as first radio and then television has increased the emphasis on home entertainment. The trend away from live entertainment also has been accelerated by the increase in the use of records in the home and places of entertainment * * *. Statistics show that the present high rate of the cabaret tax has been an important factor in adding to this decline.

The 17th District of New York, Mr. Speaker, embraces the single area in our Nation most affected by this unfair tax. The famous hotels and cabarets of my city are located there; Times Square and Broadway are within its borders; most of the great theaters. I have heard from a great many of my constituents—all urging my support of this bill. I realize that some loss of revenue may result; I am inclined to believe it will be speedily replaced even at the lower rate, by the impetus this legislation will give to the entertainment industry. But whether revenue is lost or gained, we should not permit this one great industry to continue to bear an undue burden.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend and congratulate the gentleman from Rhode Island for his untiring efforts in behalf of legislation to repeal the cabaret tax and for bringing this legislation before the House.

In past Congresses, as in this Congress, I introduced legislation to provide for the repeal of the discriminatory 20-percent tax on amounts paid for admission, refreshment, service, or merchandise, at any roof garden, cabaret, or other similar place.

This tax has had a serious effect on the employment of musicians and other entertainers. Where food and beverages alone have been served, there has been, in most cases, no tax at all. However, when the owner combines food and beverages with entertainment, a tax of 20 percent is imposed. This tax rate applies not only to admissions but also to amounts paid for refreshments, services, and merchandise. Needless to say, this tax has discouraged the proprietors of cabarets from hiring entertainment of any kind.

There is another reason why a repeal of this tax is long overdue. The rate of this tax is discriminatory and unfair. A ceiling of 10 percent applies at present to most ad valorem excise taxes. This ceiling was affirmed by the Excise Tax Reduction Act of 1954. Unfortunately, it does not apply to the cabaret tax and to a few other taxes. The cabaret tax has remained at the 20 percent level. This has proved to be neither fair nor wise.

I have long advocated an outright repeal of this discriminatory and burdensome tax. As I already mentioned, I repeatedly introduced bills to provide for this repeal. The number of my current bill on this subject is H.R. 688, 86th Congress.

I believe, however, that half a loaf is better than none, and I therefore support the legislation before us, to reduce the cabaret tax from 20 to 10 percent. This, to my mind, constitutes an overdue adjustment of an inequality which we have permitted to continue too long. This is the least that should be done to correct the discrimination against cabarets, against people employed in them, and against entertainers.

I am fully aware of the fact that a bill similar to H.R. 2164 was approved by the House last year. It was not, however, passed by the other body. I sincerely hope that the bill before us today will not meet with similar fate. I hope that it will be approved by both Houses of Congress and enacted into law. I will continue in my efforts to this end.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the bill reducing the cabaret tax from 20 percent to 10 percent. I congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means for their recognition of the necessity of following the established ceiling rate of 10 percent for ad valorem excise taxes. There is no doubt in my mind that the 20 percent cabaret tax has had as its direct effect the lessening of business in those establishments which sold food and beverages and provided entertainment for their customers.

In addition, there is no doubt that the musicians of America have been irreparably harmed by the impact of this 20 percent tax. I am certain that many of the taverns, restaurants, and hotels throughout the country will on the basis of this reduction find more customers willing to pay the reduced Federal tax for "live" entertainment. This is a step in the right direction. It is my hope that the day will come in the near future when all of the excise taxes imposed as a temporary measure for the war effort, will be eliminated.

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment Mr. FORAND, who introduced H.R. 2164, to reevaluate the tax structure as it relates to the cabaret tax. Last year I introduced a bill to eliminate the tax altogether. My bill was amended in committee to reduce the tax from 20 percent to 10 percent, and in that form it passed the House, but because of the time element it failed to pass the Senate. Again in this session of the Congress, I introduced H.R. 1779 and Mr. FORAND introduced a similar bill, H.R. 2164, to repeal the cabaret tax. Again the committee amended it, to reduce the tax to 10 percent.

For a number of years, those who have engaged in various fields of entertainment have found they have related their talents to a dying industry. Progress has taken a terrific toll in the fields of music and entertainment. Back in the days of the silent movie, musicians supplied background entertainment. With the advent of sound film, they were no longer needed. Then came the passing of vaudeville, and these same entertainers exchanged memories of better days in second-rate boardinghouses. Now, the top-level performers and musicians have little left to aspire to but nightclub entertainment, and with the imposition of a 20 percent ad valorem excise tax, the average income family can no longer enjoy this form of entertainment. Entertainers, except those stars who play in plush hotels, are in scarce demand.

I feel that the public, by and large, should be able to buy the sort of entertainment it enjoys without having the Governmet tax this pleasure out of existence. The committee, in considering H.R. 2164, has observed that the present 20 percent tax rate is burdensome and onerous to the cabaret business because it only applies to a combination of entertainment and the serving of food or beverages. It has noted in its report that where entertainment only is provided, a 10 percent admission tax usually applies, and where there is only the serving of food and beverages, there is generally no tax whatsoever. Yet under the present law if these two are offered in combination, there is today a 20 percent cabaret tax.

I admit, on the one hand, our Government will lose possibly a $21 million revenue by a reduction in the cabaret tax, and, of course, millions more if the tax were eliminated. On the other hand, if H.R. 2164 is enacted into law, there will be a marked increase in employment, especially of musicians and cabaret-type entertainers. I would predict that in the final analysis the immediate loss to the Government in tax revenue would be more than compensated by an increase in business taxes and earned income taxes on the part of both cabaret operators and of the individuals who would be returned to work. Furthermore, the average American family would not be prohibited from enjoying dinner out and an evening of recreation because of excessive taxation.

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, August 31, 1959, my distinguished colleague, Hon. EUGENE J. KEOGH, and I introduced identical bills, H.R. 8955 and H.R. 8956, to amend the act of October 19, 1949, entitled "An Act to Assist States in Collecting Sales and Use Taxes on Cigarettes." These bills have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

During legislative sessions in 1959, New York and several other States imposed a tax on cigars for the first time. At the time the imposition of tax was under consideration the tobacco industry brought to the attention of authorities in New York the fact that there already existed a considerable interstate traffic in cigars. It was argued, with much force, that the imposition of a 15-percent tax by New York, when many other States either imposed no tax or imposed a lesser rate of tax, would result in an increase in the flow of cigars into New York from other jurisdictions.

The same situation existed, and continues to exist to some extent, with respect to cigarettes when cigarette taxes were first imposed by the States. The differential in tax per unit which exists from State to State led to a considerable mail-order business in cigarettes. Federal legislation, commonly known as the Jenkins Act, was passed to overcome problems created by this interstate traffic. The problems are identical with respect to cigars, and consequently this amendment is urged.

As in the case of cigarettes, the requirement of notification of the State fiscal authority in the State to which the product is shipped accomplishes two main purposes. First, a factor of unreal competition based on the tax differential is eliminated if the same tax must be paid on products shipped into the State as is paid on products passing to the consumer from a retail outlet located within the State. Secondly, the State imposing the tax minimizes its loss of revenue through the collection of tax on all products shipped into a State for ultimate consumption therein.

The ease and simplicity of evading the tax on cigars through mail order and other purchases from outlets located in sister States, must be self-evident. Furthermore, the consumer has more economic incentive to order from a low-tax or no-tax area because of the relatively higher price per unit than in the case of cigarettes. For example, on a box of 50 25-cent cigars, a purchaser in New York could save roughly $1.87, less postage, by having cigars shipped to him from a no-tax State.

This measure will have no fiscal effect on the Federal Government. It merely seeks to protect State revenues and, at the same time, eliminate an artificial competitive disadvantage that may be suffered by the cigar industry in New York and other States imposing taxes on cigars.

In addition to the State of New York, the following States impose sales taxes on cigars: Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Vermont, and Washington.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I shall not oppose this bill reducing the amount of the cabaret tax, but I wish to take this opportunity to point out a basic paradox in which this Congress is involved. As a result of reducing the amount of the cabaret tax, the Federal Government is losing revenues of some $21 million. Yet tomorrow we will be voting on the question of raising the gasoline tax an additional penny a gallon since, we are told, there is not enough revenue to pay for the highway program.

If one was to decide the question of taxes on items that were considered unnecessary, it would seem to me that we would not remove the tax on cabarets and other such classes of entertainment so that we would not have to raise taxes in areas which have become a necessity.

Recognizing that class discriminatory tax legislation is not the kind of legislation that is good for the country, however, I will support the bill—but only reluctantly.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FULTON), there were—ayes 209, noes 4.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof), the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DETENTION OF MAIL FOR TEMPORARY PERIODS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7379) to amend the act of July 27, 1956, with respect to the detention of mail for temporary periods in the public interest, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act of July 27, 1956 (70 Stat. 699; Public Law 821, Eighty-fourth Congress; 39 U.S.C. 259b and 259c), is amended to read as follows:

"That (a) (1) when the Postmaster General determines that such action is in the public interest because of the obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, vile, or fraudulent nature of the material involved, during proceedings before him in the administration of section 3929 of the Revised Statutes (17 Stat, 322; 39 U.S.C. 259), as amended and extended by the Act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat. 964; 39 U.S.C. 259), section 4041 of the Revised Statutes (17 Stat. 323; 39 U.S.C. 732), as amended, and the Act of August 16, 1950 (64 Stat. 451; 39 U.S.C. 259a), he may enter an interim order directing that mail addressed to any person be detained by the postmaster at the post office of delivery for forty-five days from the effective date of the order. Notice of the order, advising the person of the detention and setting forth in specific detail the reasons therefor, together with a copy of this Act and such Act of August 16, 1950, shall be sent forthwith by registered or certified mail to the person at the post office at which such mail is to be detained.

"(2) Any person against whom an interim order is issued may petition in the United States district court for the district in which the post office at which such mail is held or detained is situated for an injunction restraining the postmaster from enforcement of the order if the issuance of the order was arbitrary or capricious.

"(3) Unless (A) the Postmaster General has been so restrained or (B) the Postmaster General files, within twenty days of the date of the interim order, a petition in the United States district court for the district in which the mail is detained is situated, and prior to the expiration of the interim order obtains an order directing that mail addressed to the person be detained for such further period as the court determines, an order for the detention of mail addressed to a person expires at the end of the forty-five days after the issuance thereof. Notice of the filing of such a petition shall be given forthwith by the clerk of the court in which it is filed to the person, at the post office at which the mail is being detained, or otherwise as the clerk of the court determines to be appropriate, and the person shall have five days in which to appear and show cause why the order should not issue.

"(4) If, upon all the evidence before it, the court determines that the continued detention of the mail is in the public interest, it shall forthwith issue an order directing that mail addressed to that person be detained by the postmaster at the office of delivery until conclusion of the proceeding by the Postmaster General or until further order of the court.

"(5) If, upon all the evidence before it, the court determines, that the continued detention of the mail addressed is not in the public interest, it shall dismiss the petition and order all mail addressed to him detained in any post office to be released forthwith for delivery.

"(6) An appeal from the order of the court shall be allowed as in civil cases. An order of the Postmaster General or of the district court, under this section, may be dissolved by that court at any time for cause, including failure to conduct expeditiously the proceedings instituted against the person before the Postmaster General with respect to the Act of August 16, 1950 (39 U.S.C. 259a). When, under any order authorized by this Act and such Act of August 16, 1950, to be issued by the Postmaster General or the district court, a person's mail is detained by the postmaster at the office of delivery, that person may examine the mail and receive such mail as clearly is not connected with the alleged unlawful activity.

"(b) Action by the Postmaster General in issuing the interim order provided for herein and petitioning for a continuance of an order under this section, is not subject to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 1001 and the following).

"(c) A person aggrieved by a final order of the Postmaster General issued pursuant to the authority contained in the Act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. 359; 39 U.S.C. 224), the Act of March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. 873; 39 U.S.C. 255), section 3929 of the Revised Statutes (17 Stat. 322; 39 U.S.C. 259) as amended and extended by the Act of March 2, 1895 (28 Stat. 964; 39 U.S.C. 259), the Act of August 16, 1950 (64 Stat. 451; 39 U.S.C. 259a), section 4041 of the Revised Statutes (17 Stat. 323; 39 U.S.C. 732), as amended, and sections 1461 and 1463 of title 18, United States Code, may obtain a review of the order in the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which he resides or has his principal place of business, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, by filing with the court, within thirty days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order of the Postmaster General be modified or be set aside in whole or in part. He shall file a copy of the petition with the Postmaster General, and thereupon the Postmaster General shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. The finding of the Postmaster General as to the facts shall be conclusive if supported by substantial evidence in the administrative record. The filing of an appeal under this subsection shall not operate as a stay of the order of the Postmaster General.

"(d) The provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall not apply to mail addressed to publishers of publications which have entry as second-class matter under the Act of March 3, 1879, as amended (20 Stat. 358; 39 U.S.C. 221, and the following), or to mail addressed to the agents of such publishers."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I have been concerned with the increasing use of the mail being made by the dealers of filth and smut to peddle obscene and pornographic material.

Our Postal Operations Subcommittee, under the chairmanship of the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN], has conducted a very intensive study of this problem. I am pleased with the way the subcommittee has concerned itself with the problem and commend them for the report which will be ready for release shortly. Their study has served to point up the casual relationship between obscene literature and sex crimes and juvenile delinquency. Their report will contain a suggested program for community action in the crusade against obscenity.

This legislation before us today deals with the administrative procedures of the Post Office Department which provide for the impounding of mail addressed to any person using the mail to conduct a fraud or send obscene matter.

I might point out that provision was initially made to impound such mail for a period of 20 days. Experience has proven that this is an inadequate period for the Post Office Department to complete the necessary administrative proceedings. The 45-day period for such interim impounding of mail provided in this legislation is more realistic and will serve to provide both parties with adequate time to prepare their case.

This legislation also substitutes the standard of "public interest" because of the obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, vile, or fraudulent nature of the material subject to the interim order, for the presently existing standard "necessary to the effective enforcement of the section." This standard has been successfully applied for over 20 years in the Securities and Exchange statutes and in other basic acts. Furthermore, the legislative history of this bill will include the elements enumerated by the General Counsel of the Post Office Department in his testimony as considerations going into a determination of what is in the public interest.

In view of the seriousness of the problem that the Postmaster General is faced with in regard to the exclusion of obscene matter from the mail, I urge that the Members of this body give unanimous support to this legislation.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. Several years ago the Post Office Department requested legislation, which was enacted into law, under which prosecutions could be brought for the dissemination of this filth. Those of us who worked on that legislation and were responsible for bringing it to the House and having it enacted into law are wondering why the Postmaster General of the United States has not insisted that the Attorney General bring prosecution in these cases.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, I think the Postmaster General has insisted all along that the Department of Justice initiate prosecution in these matters.

Mr. WALTER. Well, why has not the Attorney General initiated prosecutions? We do not need laws. What we need is enforcement of the existing laws.

Mr. MURRAY. Well, I cannot answer for the actions of the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is not world-shaking in importance, but it is an important piece of legislation. It is one to which some members of our committee have given a great deal of time and it ought to be approved.

Mr. Speaker, this bill will amend legislation which I introduced in the 83d Congress and of which I was cosponsor in the 84th Congress, when it was enacted an became Public Law 821.

The legislation initially provided for the impounding for a period of 20 days of mail addressed to any person using the mail to conduct a fraud or send obscene matter. At the time it was recognized that the number of days for impounding might have to be increased, based on actual experience. In the hearings held on H.R. 7379, the Post Office Department reported that the 20-day span for an interim impounding order has proven unworkable and that the Department has generaly found it impossible to complete administrative proceedings in this limited period of time. I, as a cosponsor of the initial legislation, support this change to 45 days.

With reference to the term "public interest," I would like to point out that the use of this standard is restricted to those situations which the Postmaster General determines to be in the public interest because of the obsence, lewd, lascivious, filthy, vile, or fraudulent nature of the material involved.

The Administrative Procedure Act requires elaborate formal procedures, resulting in procedural delays which have seriously impeded the Postmaster General in the performance of his duty to protect the public from illegal use of the mails. These procedural delays create an ideal climate for persons of low moral character, who promote schemes which tend to debase public morals, to cash in on their operations. These delaying tactics are being used to literally flood the mails with foul literature, pornographic pictures, and other obscenity. The Postmaster General has been deprived of adequate means to combat these revolting practices. When he finally catches up with these people after legal delays, they have made their profits and have opened business under another name.

This condition, to my mind, amounts to no less than a public scandal and we certainly owe it to the public to take corrective action. In my opinion this legislation is worthy of the support of every Member of this body because it will serve to strengthen the efforts of the Postmaster General in carrying out existing law which provides for the exclusion of obscene matter from the mail.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for his statement and the committee upon its position to check the circulation of this vile literature. It is long overdue.

Mr. Speaker, the sale of obscene literature in this country is running at more than $500 million annually. Last year alone the Postal Inspection Service investigated 14,000 complaints about obscenity in the mails.

Postmaster General Summerfield, with whom a number of us recently conferred on this problem, pointed out that nearly two-thirds of the complaints about obscenity in the mails come from parents objecting to the receipt of lewd materials by their adolescent children.

He also estimated that 700,000 to 1 million children this year will receive pornographic materials through the family mailbox. The assistance of parents is vital in catching up with these "smut sellers." Because of our guaranteed privacy of the mail, postal people can only act on the complaints of citizens who receive the material.

If obscene literature is mailed to your home, report it promptly to the postmaster and forward it on to him as evidence, including the envelope and any enclosures.

Last year I introduced a bill making it possible to prosecute filth peddlers in the area where the material is received as well as at the point of origin. The first case following the passage of this legislation was in our neighboring State at Boise, Idaho, and had to do with mailings made from California and Oregon. The offenders, a man and his wife, each received a 10-year prison sentence and a fine.

Under this bill H.R. 7379 it would be more difficult for obscene literature distributors to get around post office orders by using court delays and legal technicalities. It would permit the postmaster to enter an interim order directing that mail addressed to any person be detained for 45 days or until the U.S. District Court issues an injunction restraining the postmaster from holding such mail.

I strongly favor such legislation. It is long overdue.

Mr. REES of Kansas. May I say to the gentleman that this condition in my mind amounts to nothing less than a public scandal. We owe it to the public to take corrective action and do it now.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I most warmly commend the gentleman from Kansas as well as the chairman of this committee, for this splendid piece of legislation. I certainly support it in every particular.

I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I am the author of another bill pending before his committee which would supplement the pending legislation in a functional fashion.

H.R. 7506, which I introduced on June 2, 1959, would establish in the Post Office Department as a matter of statute a position which already exists as a matter of administrative decree, viz: judicial officer for the Post Office Department. The judicial officer renders the final agency decision on all obscenity and fraud matters for the Post Office Department. He is the alter ego of the Postmaster General in that respect. He is, by necessity, experienced in the legal and practical problems of curbing obscenity and fraud in the mails. He is an independent officer of the Post Office Department in the sense that he is not responsible to the General Counsel, to the inspectors, or to any person in the Post Office Department except the Postmaster General himself. Normally he renders his decisions as to whether a mailing is obscene or fraudulent on appeal by either the complainant—who is the General Counsel of the Post Office Department—or the accused.

However, the Post Office Department has only two hearing examiners, and it is not likely that in the foreseeable future it will have any more hearing examiners. Therefore, as a matter of economy and practicality, inasmuch as these hearings are held all over the country, it is sometimes advisable to have the judicial officer preside at the reception of evidence—that is to say, at the trial—and render one decision which is both the trial decision and the administrative appellate decision.

More important, however, is the fact that sometimes it is impossible for the General Counsel of the Post Office Department to seek successfully an interim impounding order; or, as often happens, after the General Counsel once obtains the order, a purveyor of obscenity goes to court and gets the order dissolved or restrained. In such cases, it is sometimes advantageous for the General Counsel to be able to move the judicial officer to hear the case and render the final agency decision all in one proceeding, thereby avoiding a long delay, during which the purveyor of obscenity is successfully distributing his pornographic poison to the homes of America. This procedure for bypassing the hearing examiners has in the past been utilized selectively by the Post Office Department. However, I believe it is a weapon that the Post Office Department should have and employ as a matter of statute. After all, if a purveyor can make all his profits during the pendency of the administrative proceeding, what good is the administrative proceeding?

The rules of procedure for administrative hearings in the Post Office Department already provide that the judicial officer has this authority. However, a Federal district court in New York City, in the case of Borg-Johnson against Christenberry, held that the judicial officer, not being statutory and not being a regular hearing examiner within the purview of section 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act, could not be permitted to preside at the reception of evidence.

Thus, my bill is simply designed to overcome the effect of the Borg-Johnson decision, and to reestablish the authority of the judicial officer as the Postmaster General had established it by the regulations published in the Federal Register prior to this court decision in New York City.

The need for these procedures was mentioned by the General Counsel of the Post Office Department in his April 23, 1959, statement. Accordingly, I feel confident that my bill will receive the complete endorsement of the Post Office Department, and I urge the committee to hold early hearings and give the matter expeditious consideration.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the charming and gracious young woman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN], who was the chairman of the subcommittee which handled this legislation.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 7379, introduced by myself, and identical bills, H.R. 7416, introduced by our colleague [Mr. CUNNINGHAM], and H.R. 7441, introduced by our colleague [Mr. WALLHAUSER], will assist the Postmaster General in carrying out existing law which provides for the exclusion of obscene matter from the mail. H.R. 7379, as amended, was reported favorably by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service by a unanimous vote.

Basically, this proposed legislation extends the time for impounding the mail addressed to any person using the mails for sending obscene matter from the present 20 days to 45 days and authorizes a like impounding of mail addressed to any person using the mails for fraudulent purposes.

H.R. 7379 also substitutes the standard of "public interest" because of the obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, vile, or fraudulent nature of the material subject to the interim order, for the presently existing standard "necessary to the effective enforcement of the section." This new standard, which is broad in concept, would allow consideration to be given to the variables and intangibles, which may vary in each case. Provision is made for any mailer against whom an interim order is issued to petition an appropriate U.S. district court for an injunction restraining the enforcement of the interim impounding order.

The proposed legislation also clarifies the right of appeal to the appropriate court of appeals from the district court's order with respect to an interim order and recognizes the right of the district court to dissolve its own order or the order of the Postmaster General at any time for cause.

Existing law authorizes the Postmaster General to enter an interim order directing that mail addressed for any person using the mail for sending obscene matter be held and detained by the postmaster at the post office of delivery for a period of 20 days from the effective date of such order.

The Post Office Department has reported that the 20-day span for an interim impounding order has proven unworkable in that the Post Office Department has generally found it impossible to complete administrative proceedings in this limited period of time. It is felt that a 20-day life span for an interim impounding order is completely unrealistic. If provision for a 45-day period were to be enacted, the Post Office Department would attempt to complete its administrative proceedings within 45 days.

The interim impounding order is similar in nature to an injunction, in that it temporarily prevents an individual or an enterprise believed to be using the mails to disseminate obscene matter or to perpetrate a fraud, from receiving further remittances of money until the right thereto has been established. It should be noted that there is no irreparable injury which will result to the respondent should the respondent prevail in his case, he will get his mail within a reasonable time, but if he fails to overcome the complainant's case, because it is proven that he was sending obscene matter or conducting a fraudulent enterprise through the mails, he will be denied his ill-gotten gain.

The bill would in no way preclude the right of a person whose mail is detained to examine his mail and receive such mail as is clearly not connected with the alleged unlawful activity.

With reference to the term "public interest," I wish to point out that the following language has been included in the committee amendment: "Because of the obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, vile, or fraudulent nature of the material involved,". Thus, it should be clear that any action taken by the Postmaster General under this legislation must relate to individuals or enterprises using the mails to disseminate obscene matter or to perpetrate a fraud. Furthermore, the committee report sets forth the factors that the General Counsel of the Post Office Department testified would be considered before the Department would impose an interim impounding order.

The use of the U.S. mails for the wholesale promotion and conduct of mail order business in obscene and pornographic materials is a serious problem that should be of genuine concern to the citizens of our Nation. The vicious aspect of this matter is the fact that these purveyors of filth are aiming their products more and more at the youth of our land.

Censorship, as such, was not involved when the provision for impounding mail for 20 days was enacted into law. Neither is censorship involved in this measure, which extends to 45 days the period for impounding mail addressed to any person using the mails for sending obscene matter or conducting a fraudulent enterprise through the mails.

Enactment of this legislation will not result in any additional cost to the Government but will provide a more effective means for the Post Office Department to carry out its responsibilities.

The Post Office Department feels strongly that this legislation is essential if its administrative procedures are to be effective to keep the flow of obscenity and fraudulent schemes from the mail and at the same time preserve a practical procedural similarity between its fraud, mailability second-class, and obscenity responsibilities.

I urge adoption of H.R. 7379, as amended.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I congratulate the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania for the leadership she has given for many months in conducting public hearings throughout the country and for the effective work she and other members of her subcommittee did in connection with the public hearings and the reporting of this bill to the full committee. I commend her further for the leadership the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania gave in the full Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in having this bill reported out. Countless millions of Americans have followed the action of your subcommittee under your leadership, and I know of no bill in many years on which there has been such widespread approval as the bill that your subcommittee and the full committee have reported. The country owes the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania a debt of gratitude and through you to the members of your subcommittee for the remarkable work you have done in this important field. I know I speak the sentiments of my colleagues and the sentiments of the people of America in saying, "Thank you."

I also want to congratulate the gentlewoman for one of the most powerful arguments in support of any bill that I have heard in all my years in Congress.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his very kind remarks.

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mrs. KELLY. I want to join the gentleman from Massachusetts in his remarks in complimenting the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania and the entire committee for bringing this bill before us at this time. I am sure there is no one who realizes the importance of protecting our homes more than the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania. I thank the gentlewoman and the committee for bringing this bill to the floor at this time.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to congratulate the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania for her very effective work in this regard. Obviously, the Post Office Department should be equipped with whatever instrumentality is necessary to permit it to cope effectively with matters of obscenity and obvious fraud.

The reason for my inquiry at this moment is to ascertain that it is the purpose of the committee in recommending this legislation that this power now given to the Post Office Department to seize and hold mail is to be limited to matters of obvious obscenity and fraud and not to be extended by general interpretations to other classes of mail.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CUNNINGHAM], ranking member of the subcommittee bringing this legislation before us.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, having sponsored this legislation with the very distinguished gentlewoman from Pennsylvania, I wholeheartedly support it. I want to congratulate all members of the committee upon a very fine job in this very difficult field. It seems that all people, or most of them, throughout the United States, want something done about this problem, but it is a very difficult one to deal with because of the very many ramifications, legal and otherwise, involved.

This legislation that we are talking about here today is already on the books. There are some minor changes in wording, but essentially the gist of this legislation is now a part of our statutes. What this bill does is simply to extend the impounding power to a full 45 days rather than 20, because the postal officials have found that 20 days is not sufficient time in which to do the processing necessary. They have a staff of legal experts in the Department who believe that one main drawback is not sufficient time to do the administrative work necessary, and that is the reason for the request for an extension to 45 days.

I hope the Members of the House will look favorably upon this legislation. It is the result of many, many weeks of hard work by the subcommittee. We have had hearings here in Washington and other sections of the country. The people throughout the country, I repeat, are aroused. They are anxious that something be done in this field.

Because of the many problems we have had to consider, Supreme Court decisions and otherwise, we believe that this is one of the principal ways in which we can deal with this problem.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania which indicated that there might be some lack of cooperation by the Department of Justice, I would say that they have done all they can with the problems in connection with this particular statute. I will say that in the field of obscenity the Post Office Department through its legal staff, and the Justice Department have done an outstanding job, as well as in the field of fraudulent materials sent through the mails.

So I urge the passage of this bill on the part of all those who want to answer the queries and the interest in the minds of the people throughout the United States. This is one of the very finest ways in which they can do it.

Mr. Speaker, as ranking minority member of the Postal Operations Subcommittee, as I mentioned previously, I cosponsored this legislation with our gracious chairwoman, Mrs. GRANAHAN. Our colleague from New Jersey [Mr. WALLHAUSER], also joined us in introducing similar legislation, and may I add that Mr. WALLHAUSER is a valuable addition to the subcommittee and one who has worked diligently on this problem. We appreciate his fine cooperation and his attention to the problems facing the subcommittee.

This legislation before the House today has been carefully drawn with the complete cooperation of the Post Office Department. It is a bipartisan measure, designed with one and only one purpose—to help the Post Office officials put the dealers of pornographic matter out of operation.

I have compared this racket to the sale of dope to minors, for the sickening type of material that these dealers put out is certainly a poison to healthy young minds, just as dope is an attack on healthy young bodies.

This bill before us today will expand—but within definite limits—the power of the Post Office Department to deal with known distributors and producers of this type of filth. This is not a censorship bill, nor does it try to define what is pornographic or objectionable. That is for the courts.

As I said a few moments ago, it is designed solely to give additional tools to the Post Office Department to help put these dealers in pornographic material out of operation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks immediately following those of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CUNNINGHAM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I advocate the passage of H.R. 7379, which would amend the act of July 27, 1956, with respect to the detention of mail for temporary periods in the public interest, and for other purposes.

The time has arrived when Federal laws to curb the mailing and transportation of obscene material are necessary. Approximately 1 million minor children will be solicited this year through the mails for the sale of obscene materials.

Traffic in obscenity has doubled in the last 5 years, and if action is not taken, can double again by 1963. Certainly this traffic by pornographic literature dispensers has had an effect on our Nation. We read with saddened hearts the tragic incidents that occur on the streets of our cities caused by so-called juvenile delinquents. I wonder how much we contribute to the deterioration of our youth by our failure to enact laws to stop the mail order obscenity racket.

I feel every community in our Nation should be alerted to the traffic in obscenity. The youth of our country should be protected from this heinous practice. Filth racketeers aim their evil literature at our youth. This evil practice poses a threat at the moral fiber of our Nation and should be eradicated.

It is time that promiscuous material, which has certainly polluted the minds of many of our minor children, cause us great concern. There are some who are deeply concerned about censorship when it comes to removing some of this material from the mail, but I feel that people who desire their children to develop real moral and Christian character want this flood of smutty material be kept from their homes. I urge the passage of this bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHIPLEY].

Mr. SHIPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation before us today. This bill has received a lot of attention at the hands of the subcommittee. I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania who has done a wonderful job in handling the meetings we have had. We have had testimony from many, many people interested in this legislation, and most of it has been real good.

The gentlewoman from Pennsylvania has given a good explanation of the bill.

I would like to comment just briefly on one down-to-earth angle of it, as it affects each Member of Congress who has children or grandchildren. We are all affected by the filth that has been sent through the mails. It has been available to our youth for many, many years, and I know personally that it is responsible for much of the crime that is committed. We worked very hard for this legislation, and I have no doubt but what it will pass.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALLHAUSER].

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege for me to join with my distinguished colleagues in urging the passage of this legislation. Under the capable chairmanship of the Honorable KATHRYN E. GRANAHAN, the Subcommittee on Postal Operations of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee has thoroughly investigated the need for providing additional legislative tools to assist the Post Office Department in properly dealing with the staggering volume of pornographic material that is being sent through our mails. I would like to note that my distinguished colleague from Nebraska, the Honorable GLENN CUNNINGHAM, the ranking minority member, and I introduced companion bills to indicate our sincere belief in the need for this legislation and also to emphasize that this is a bipartisan effort.

The purpose of the basic laws now on the statute books which this legislation seeks to aid is to protect the prospective victims of this pornographic filth in the easiest possible way, namely, by preventing them from becoming victims.

Without going into technical details, which are well explained in the committee report and by our chairman, suffice it to say that the Post Office Department requires this legislative assistance to increase the effectiveness of its fight against the vicious and degrading business of the distribution of pornographic material.

The public is aroused and has joined in the fight, through organized community efforts at the local level, and leaders in all walks of life in many sections of the country are working shoulder to shoulder with the Post Office Department and Postmaster General Summerfield and our committee to awaken our citizenry to the spreading disease to which we are being exposed when obscene material is allowed to come into our homes.

War has been declared against this dread enemy to our moral well-being, and I sincerely hope that every Member of this great body will join in the crusade to win the victory.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Post Office Subcommittee on Postal Operations, it has been my privilege to work with our able Chairman, the gracious and hard-working gentlewoman from Pennsylvania, to bring this bill to the floor of the House, today, for action.

For several weeks, we have held hearings to gather the facts for this further attack upon those who profit from the pornographic and smut material, being sent through our mails. The evidence, Mr. Speaker, piles up every day which unmistakably proves that Congress must fight continuously and even more aggressively against this scourge which is attacking the very foundations of America.

This bill has been explained in detail by our distinguished chairman and needs no further amplification from me. It is well to note that the Post Office officials need more effective tools with which to work against these unscrupulous merchants of filth. No quarter or mercy whatsoever, can be shown them. They are engaged in this shady and shoddy business, accounting in volume to $500 million annually. They are crafty and they are resourceful. Our officials, who have the responsibility to protect our mails against this illicit traffic, have requested this additional weapon to do the job. The great preponderance of the testimony before our committee was in support of this approach and suggestions for even stronger legislation have been made.

Personally, I do not feel this bill goes far enough. I strongly believe that we should impose penalties against these violators of decency and exploiters of filth, of similar severity as those which are levied against narcotic peddlers and kidnapers. This problem, Mr. Speaker, will never be met with inadequate fines and mild prison sentences. This is big business and big penalties are required. The purveyors of pornography, in my opinion, are the scum of society and should be handled as such.

It is interesting to note that Hungarian refugees in our large cities cannot understand our relatively placid acceptance of the "rot" on our news stands. They ask why does America tolerate the traffic in such poison for the brainwashing of our youth and the undermining of our society.

Congress must lead in this crusade to clean up these sewers of communication which are despoiling and fouling our Nation. In many areas of the country, civil groups are organizing to help our law enforcement officers to meet the great need for the elimination of this threat. I know, Mr. Speaker, that the membership of this House will unanimously back up our committee in the passage of this bill. In the weeks and months ahead, the Postal Operations Subcommittee, under the combined leadership of the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN] and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CUNNINGHAM], will continue to fight to alert America to the objective which we intend to reach; namely, the liquidation of these unconscionable and ruthless exploiters of indecency and filth.

There is no need, Mr. Speaker, for me to urge the passage of this bill because it is obvious that the House unanimously supports it.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill under consideration authorizing the Postmaster General to more effectively exclude from the U.S. mails all obscene matter.

During the 84th Congress, I enjoyed the privilege of membership on the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, a subcommittee of which conducted extensive study into the current practice of using the U.S. mails to distribute obscene and fraudulent matters. As a result of this study, Congress enacted legislation authorizing the Postmaster General to impound mail directed to a person or firm known to be engaged in the distribution of such literature. During the 85th Congress, Congress authorized the detention of such mail, both at point of origin and point of destination. As a result of this law, the Post Office Department completed approximately 10,000 separate investigations, almost two-thirds of which were based on complaints of parents whose children received solicitations for sales of obscene material through the mails.

The need for additional legislation to render this law more effective was pointed up by the charming and able lady from Pennsylvania, Mrs. KATHRYN GRANAHAN, whose bill I am pleased to cosponsor.

Experience has shown that the present 20-day limit on the detention of mail is insufficient for the Post Office Department to complete the necessary administrative proceedings of its impounding order. Under this 20-day limit, respondents were able to secure from the courts a temporary restraining order against the enforcement of the impounding order, thereby receiving their mail and securing their profit, before the administrative proceeding could be completed. The extension to 45 days for the detention of obscene literature will enable the Post Office Department to complete its administrative proceedings in most cases.

The bill also applies to all fraudulent material being distributed through the mails.

It also substitutes the standard of "public interest" for the presently existing standard "necessary to the effective enforcement of the section." This new standard, which is broad in concept, would allow for consideration to be given to variables and intangibles which may vary in each case, such as the nature or character of the enterprise, its method of operation and the size or extent of that operation.

The enactment of this legislation will not result in any additional cost to the Government, but will provide a more effective means for the Post Office Department to carry out its responsibilities. This legislation, together with the cooperation of alert citizenry, will arrest the establishment of and prevent the growth of vicious business practices which have developed which seek to poison the minds of our youth and impose fraudulent business schemes upon the public in general.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 7379, a bill intended to help us stop the dissemination of indecent and obscene literature through the mails.

This is a subject which has been of deep interest to me for many years. Since my first election to Congress, I have worked for the enactment of legislation which would provide a strong and effective prohibition on the use of mails for the distribution of indecent matter. The distribution of such material is a menace and an everlasting threat to the morals of our youth and of our society. It should not be condoned. It must be fought with every legal and just means at our disposal.

Back in the 82d Congress, almost a decade ago, I supported the enactment of Public Law 531 which outlawed the transportation in interstate commerce of indecent material, including motion picture films, letters, phonograph records, and printed matter. We had hoped, when that law was placed on our statute books, that we had licked the problem. We found that this was not the case. And so, in the 84th Congress, I worked for the enactment of Public Law 95 which strengthened the original prohibition on the distribution of indecent mail. Both of those laws—Public Law 531, 82d Congress, and Public Law 95, 84th Congress—were good laws. They are sound, and they are in the public interest. Unfortunately, the disseminators of indecent literature and other obscene matter—who are very unscrupulous and very cunning—have been able to escape the full effect of these measures. They have been able in some cases to get around them.

The bill before us—H.R. 7379—would strengthen the hand of the Post Office Department in dealing with people who use the mails for the distribution of smutty literature. It would make the enforcement of our existing laws more effective. I am very much in favor of this.

Under our present law, the Post Office Department has the authority to detain, for a period of 20 days, mail addressed for any person using the mails for sending obscene matter. This authority to impound mail pending a hearing is essential to effective enforcement of our laws outlawing the use of mails for the dissemination of indecent matter. If persons guilty of such practices are permitted to use the mails during the course of administrative proceedings, they can reap their ill-gotten gains by the time the decision is rendered and an appropriate order issued. This should not be permitted to happen.

In a number of cases, the Post Office Department has found that 20 days is insufficient to enable it to complete administrative proceedings. Therefore, the bill before us would give the Department additional authority in this respect: under the bill, the mail could be impounded for a period of 45 days. The bill would also authorize a like impounding of mail addressed to any person using the mails for fraudulent purposes.

I strongly support this proposal. It will not hurt anyone. If the respondent prevails in his case, he will get his mail within a reasonable time. However, if he fails to prove that he is not engaging in illegal activities, he will be denied his ill-gotten gains.

This proposed change in the law is necessary to temporarily prevent persons using the mails to disseminate obscene matter or to perpetrate a fraud from receiving further remittances of money until their right to it has been established. By being able to move swiftly and effectively against such persons, the Post Office Department—with the alert cooperation of our citizenry—will be in a better position to clamp down on such illegal activities.

It is my sincere hope that this legislation will be approved promptly and enacted into law.

Mr. DOWDY. Mr. Speaker, there should be no question but this bill be adopted. This bill will amend the law sponsored by myself and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] in the 84th Congress, which provides 20-day impoundment. I felt 20 days insufficient at that time, but it was all we could get. Furthermore, these impoundment orders will be brought within the substantial-evidence rule on appeals, as is true of other administrative orders.

This proposal should not be confused with criminal prosecutions. This is to deprive offenders of the fruits of their crimes by impounding the mail containing remittances from their customers.

Because of decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, prosecutions for crimes arising from dealing in pornography have become impossible for all practical purposes, because of the holding that the first amendment protects advocation of immorality, and so forth. Surely, however, Congress still has a right to decide what is and is not mailable, just as scorpions, dynamite, and so forth, are not mailable under the law, even though it is not a crime to own same. This is a matter that should have the consideration of the subcommittee which reported H.R. 7379, and I here and now tender to that committee and to the Post Office Department the benefit of my services in that connection, for whatever it is worth.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the great and good lady from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN] for her fight against obscenity in the mails.

Indeed this has become a serious problem and one which should not go unnoticed by Members of Congress. The purveyors of filth through the mails must be stopped. I believe that this drastic problem demands a drastic solution. I believe that Mrs. GRANAHAN's bill goes a long way in dealing with this drastic situation which faces our Nation. It is my hope, however, that the bill will be applied strictly, and will not destroy certain constitutional liberties which are basic to our society. We should not forget that the basic job of the Postmaster General and the Post Office is to deliver mail—not censor it.

This bill, I believe, helps the Postmaster General in deciding what is obscene. If correctly applied, we will have done much to protect our society from obscenity while protecting basic constitutional guarantees.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a companion bill to that sponsored by my distinguished and gracious colleague from Philadelphia, the Honorable KATHRYN GRANAHAN. Its aim is also to drive out of the mailing facilities of the Government the vast quantity of obscene material which is sold to the people of the country. Drastic action is taken by Government to curtail the sale of illegal drugs because it is against the interest of the public and dangerous to the health of the people. In the same manner the distribution of obscene material contributes to the delinquency of our youth and to the possible commission of crime among the adults. It is definitely against the interest of the public to permit the flow of obscenity to continue and this bill gives the authorities more time to obtain the information necessary to exclude such material from the mails. I commend Mrs. GRANAHAN for the leadership and efforts which she has put forth on behalf of the people of our country.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I also wish to congratulate the charming and gracious gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs. GRANAHAN], on the splendid leadership she has shown on this important measure.

One of the finest statements I have seen on the necessity of this bill is the following excellent editorial published in the South Bend (Ind.) Tribune of August 25, 1959, entitled "Congress Should Pass It."

CONGRESS SHOULD PASS IT

A bill intended to help the Postmaster General enforce the law against obscene matter in the mails has been approved by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

Time is running out fast in the current session of Congress. There are some indications that the House and the Senate are striving to adjourn before the premier of the Soviet Union visits the United States next month.

With many vital matters commanding consideration, it is possible that the House and the Senate will have to sidetrack some lesser bills.

The House bill extending the time for impounding mail in obscenity cases from the present 20 days to 45 days shouldn't be treated as if it were relatively unimportant.

This is a reasonable bill. The Postmaster General considers it of vital importance to his Department in fighting filth in the mails. Therefore, now that it has been approved by the House committee it should be expedited in both houses.

The current campaign against obscenity in the mails is beginning to pay off.

The bill to give the Department a little more elbow room where impounding material is concerned is highly important.

Its prompt passage would raise morale in the ranks of the army locked in battle with the scum capitalizing on obscenity.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department has estimated that the annual income realized by the promotion of the nationwide network of mail-order obscenity approximates $500 million and that the volume of filth disseminated annually can be measured in tons.

The tactics employed by these individuals in peddling their wares is well known to all. They frequent school and recreation areas in their constant search for young minds to corrupt. They compile their mailing lists often using innocent advertisements as a bait to lure the unsuspecting young. I suspect that the sharp increase in teenage crimes since Word War II amply reflects the effect of this conspiracy against the moral well-being of our young people.

Steps have been and are being taken to rid the mails of this filth. The 85th Congress passed a measure allowing prosecution of the smut peddlers not only at the point of depositing this matter in the mail but also at any point along the line. This law, which I was pleased to support, has already been implemented and has resulted in the conviction of persons who were normally almost prosecution proof due to the liberal decisions of the courts of some areas as to what constitutes obscenity. Already this year, the number of persons arrested for mailing pornographic matter is substantially higher than for a similar period during fiscal 1958, which saw the highest number of arrests on record for the same offense.

In testimony before the Postal Affairs Subcommittee of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, the Post Office Department, through its General Counsel, suggested certain changes in existing Federal law aimed at strengthening its campaign against obscenity. These changes dealt primarily with the detention of suspect mail for a period of time sufficient to allow postal authorities to complete the necessary administrative proceedings prior to the filing of criminal charges.

In addition, the Department suggested a redefinition of the term "legitimate list of subscribers" contained in title 39, United States Code, section 226. This suggested change was intended to get at those publications which are less than "hard core" by defining the term "subscribers" in such a way as to tighten requirements governing the second class mailing privileges now enjoyed by many of this type of publication. It was the feeling of the Department that such a restriction would eliminate from mailing lists the names of many persons who find themselves recipients of unordered, offensive literature.

Acting on the recommendations of the Department, I offered a bill, H.R. 7478, which is similar to the measure now under discussion except that it adds a provision embodying the proposed change in the aforementioned section 226.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Postal Affairs Subcommittee which is headed so ably by the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRANAHAN], for the forthright and constructive manner in which it considered this problem. I feel that this bill will go a long way toward closing the loopholes in our Federal antiobscenity statutes so that Federal authority can be combined with the efforts of our State officials, clergy, and lay leaders in a concerted effort to stamp out this network of mail-order smut.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge that the House act favorably on this legislation.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I take this time in order to ask a few questions of the author of the bill and the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentlewoman from Pennsylvania [Mrs GRANAHAN].

It is a fact, is it not, that for the first time in the history of this type of problem a new concept has been introduced under which the burden of proof is entirely shifted to the mailer to prove that the order of the Postmaster General has been arbitrary and capricious in issuing an impounding order; is that not a fact? Is this not a rather drastic new introduction into this area?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. No, there is nothing drastic about this provision which is to the best interest of the public. Such standards have been applied successfully in other areas in the law.

Mr. LINDSAY. Well, I refer the gentlewoman to page 3 of the committee report, about the middle of the page, where it says:

This legislation establishes a new concept which requires the mailer to show that the interim impounding order was issued arbitrarily or capriciously in order to contest it. Thus, the mailer would have the burden of proof and it would be up to him to establish to the judge's satisfaction that the Postmaster General acted arbitrarily or capriciously—

And so forth.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Well, this could be used in the case of fraud, and I think fraud is very closely linked with the subject matter.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think this is a rather drastic new concept to introduce in an area where we are talking about constitutional rights. And when we introduce a standard called the public interest, we are also breaking new ground. It is too loose and it raises constitutional questions.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Well, it is strengthening the law; there is no question about that. But, I intended to do that, and I think it is high time that we did do that, because I am shocked and amazed at the filth that is being distributed around today. I emphasize that the matter of public interest must go to the question of obscenity or fraud.

Mr. LINDSAY. I am sure that we are all shocked and amazed. I agree with you. I am shocked and amazed also, but must we burn down the whole barn in order to catch the rat? My question is, Is this not rather a drastic step to take, when it is completely unprecedented, as the report indicates it is? But, there are other important considerations here as well, namely, constitutional ones.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. While this is a new concept in this area of the law, it is not a new concept in other areas of the law.

Mr. LINDSAY. Well, is the general principle that the establishment of the burden of proof on the mailer to establish that the order of the Postmaster General is capricious, something new or not? My understanding is that it is a new concept.

Mr. DOWDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DOWDY. I think I can answer that question. All this does is to bring this kind of an order under the substantial evidence rule, which is used in administrative agencies. Whenever you go into court the record comes there for review by the court. If that record reflects substantial evidence sustaining the Department's position, the court will uphold the Department.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. LINDSAY. I refer to page 9 of the committee report, second line from the top. The report reads:

> Thus, it would preclude the mailer from inviting the judge into the position of making a determination upon the final issue of obscenity.

Does this mean that the bill is to be construed as precluding the courts from passing upon the question of obscenity, and does not that go to the heart of the question?

Mrs. GRANAHAN. If the offender wanted to go into court and get a restraining order, he could do that. But, I am sure he would not.

Mr. LINDSAY. Well, in order to determine whether or not the order of the Postmaster General is arbitrary and capricious, and the burden is on the mailer to establish that, as I understand under this legislation, the court is not allowed to pass on the question of obscenity.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a Supreme Court decision.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

POSTMASTER GENERAL ARTHUR E. SUMMERFIELD ATTEMPTS TO STOP CIRCULATION OF "FILTH" THROUGH THE U.S. POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is an effort to aid Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield in his commendable, determined effort to lessen and, if possible, stop the circulation through the Post Office Department of nasty, dirty, filthy publications—publications which are sold by greedy individuals, who, to quote U.S. Supreme Court Justice Frankfurter, are engaged in the public sale and distribution of "dirt for money's sake."

The Postmaster General has for a long time been fighting a powerful financial group, the members of which apparently care not at all for common decency, for morality, for any of the long accepted thinking of our people, and who are willing for financial gain to publicly, brazenly disregard our people's accepted idea of morality.

But the Postmaster General will have difficulty in accomplishing his desire for a clean mail service.

Recently the Supreme Court unanimously held (though it wrote six opinions) that a license to exhibit a motion picture could not be denied "because its subject matter is adultery presented as being right and desirable for certain people under certain circumstances."

A copy of that decision will be found at the end of these remarks, and the reasoning therein, if adhered to, will make it extremely difficult for the Postmaster General to see to it that matter obnoxious to the overwhelming majority of our citizens is barred from the mail.

We commend him for his present effort and we know that he will courageously adhere to his purpose.

The Supreme Court decision is as follows:

> SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958—KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORP., APPELLANT, v. THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Stewart delivered the opinion of the Court.

Once again the Court is required to consider the impact of New York's motion picture licensing law upon first amendment liberties, protected by the 14th amendment from infringement by the States. Cf. Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495.

The New York statute makes it unlawful "to exhibit, or to sell, lease, or lend for exhibition at any place of amusement for pay or in connection with any business in the State of New York, any motion picture film or reel [with certain exceptions not relevant here], unless there is at the time in full force and effect a valid license or permit therefor of the education department."[1] The law provides that a license shall issue "unless such film or a part thereof is obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, sacrilegious, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime."[2] A recent statutory amendment provides that "the term 'immoral' and the phrase 'of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals' shall denote a motion picture film or part thereof, the dominant purpose or effect of which is erotic or pornographic; or which portrays acts of sexual immorality, perversion, or lewdness, or which expressly or impliedly presents such acts as desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior."[3]

As the distributor of a motion picture entitled "Lady Chatterley's Lover," the appellant Kingsley submitted that film to the motion picture division of the New York Education Department for a license. Finding three isolated scenes in the film "'immoral' within the intent of our law," the division refused to issue a license until the scenes in question were deleted. The distributor petitioned the regents of the State of New York for a review of that ruling.[4] The regents upheld the denial of a license, but on the broader ground that "the whole theme of this motion picture is immoral under said law, for that theme is the presentation of adultery as a desirable, acceptable and proper pattern of behavior."

Kingsley sought judicial review of the regents' determination.[5] The appellate division unanimously annulled the action of the regents and directed that a license be issued (4 App. Div. 2d 348, 165 N.Y.S. 2d 681). A sharply divided court of appeals, however, reversed the appellate division and upheld the regents' refusal to license the film for exhibition (4 N.Y. 2d 349, 175 N.Y.S. 2d 39).[6]

The court of appeals unanimously and explicitly rejected any notion that the film is obscene.[7] See Roth v. United States, 354 U.S.

[6] Although four of the seven judges of the court of appeals voted to reverse the order of the appellate division, only three of them were of the clear opinion that denial of a license was permissible under the Constitution. Chief Judge Conway wrote an opinion in which Judges Froessel and Burke concurred, concluding that denial of the license was constitutionally permissible. Judge Desmond wrote a separate concurring opinion in which he stated: "I confess doubt as to the validity of such a statute, but I do not know how that doubt can be resolved unless we reverse here and let the Supreme Court have the final say." Judge Dye, Judge Fuld, and Judge Van Voorhis wrote separate dissenting opinions.

[7] The opinion written by Chief Judge Conway stated: "[I]t is curious indeed to say in one breath, as some do, that obscene motion pictures may be censored, and then in another breath that motion pictures which alluringly portray adultery as proper and desirable may not be censored. As stated above, 'The law is concerned with effect, not merely with but one means of producing it.' It must be firmly borne in mind that to give obscenity, as defined, the stature of the only constitutional limitation is to extend an invitation to corrupt the public morals by methods of presentation which craft will insure do not fall squarely within the definition of that term. Precedent, just as sound principle, will not support a statement that motion pictures must be 'out and out' obscene before they may be censored."

Judge Desmond's concurring opinion stated: "[It is not] necessarily determinative that this film is not obscene in the dictionary sense." Judge Dye's dissenting opinion stated: "No one contends that the film in question is within the narrow legal limits of obscenity as recently defined by the Supreme Court." Judge Van Voorhis' dissenting opin-

476. Rather, the court found that the picture as a whole "alluringly portrays adultery as proper behavior." As Chief Judge Conway's prevailing opinion emphasized, therefore, the only portion of the statute involved in this case is that part of sections 122 and 122(a) of the education law requiring the denial of a license to motion pictures "which are immoral in that they portray 'acts of sexual immorality * * * as desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior.'"[8] A majority of the court of appeals ascribed to that language a precise purpose of the New York Legislature to require the denial of a license to a motion picture "because its subject matter is adultery presented as being right and desirable for certain people under certain circumstances."[9]

We accept the premise that the motion picture here in question can be so characterized. We accept too, as we must, the construction of the New York Legislature's language which the court of appeals has put upon it. Albertson v. Millard, 345 U.S. 242; United States v. Burnison, 339 U.S. 87; Aero Mayflower Transit Co. v. Board of R.R. Comm'rs, 332 U.S. 495. That construction, we emphasize, gives to the term "sexual immorality" a concept entirely different from the concept embraced in words like "obscenity" or "pornography."[10] Moreover, it is not suggested that the film would itself operate as an incitement to illegal action. Rather, the New York Court of Appeals tells us that the relevant portion of the New York Education Law requires the denial of a license to any motion picture which approvingly portrays an adulterous relationship, quite without reference to the manner of its portrayal.

What New York has done, therefore, is to prevent the exhibition of a motion picture because that picture advocates an idea—that adultery under certain circumstances may be proper behavior. Yet the first amendment's basic guarantee is of freedom to advocate ideas. The State, quite simply, has thus struck at the very heart of constitutionally protected liberty.

It is contended that the State's action was justified because the motion picture attractively portrays a relationship which is contrary to the moral standards, the religious precepts, and the legal code of its citizenry. This argument misconceives what it is that the Constitution protects. Its guarantee is not confined to the expression of ideas that are conventional or shared by a majority. It protects advocacy of the opinion that adultery may sometimes be proper, no less than advocacy of socialism or the single tax. And in the realm of ideas it protects expression which is eloquent no less than that which is unconvincing.

Advocacy of conduct proscribed by law is not, as Mr. Justice Brandeis long ago pointed out, "a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on." Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, at 376 (concurring opinion). "Among free men, the deterrents ordinarily to be applied to prevent crime are education and punishment for violations of the law, not abridgment of the rights of free speech." Id., at 378.[11]

The inflexible command which the New York Court of Appeals has attributed to the State legislature thus cuts so close to the core of constitutional freedom as to make it quite needless in this case to examine the periphery. Specifically, there is no occasion to consider the appellant's contention that the State is entirely without power to require films of any kind to be licensed prior to their exhibition. Nor need we here determine whether, despite problems peculiar to motion pictures, the controls which a State may impose upon this medium of expression are precisely coextensive with those allowable for newspapers,[12] books,[13] or individual speech.[14] It is enough for the present case to reaffirm that motion pictures are within the 1st and 14th amendments' basic protection. Joseph Burstyn, Inc., v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495. Reversed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958— KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORPORATION, APPELLANT, v. THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Black, concurring.

I concur in the Court's opinion and judgment but add a few words because of concurring opinions by several Justices who rely on their appraisal of the movie "Lady Chatterley's Lover" for holding that New York cannot constitutionally bar it. Unlike them, I have not seen the picture. My view is that stated by Mr. Justice Douglas, that prior censorship of moving pictures like prior censorship of newspapers and books violates the first and fourteenth amendments. If despite the Constitution, however, this Nation is to embark on the dangerous road of censorship, my belief is that this Court is about the most inappropriate supreme board of censors that could be found. So far as I know, judges possess no special expertise providing exceptional competency to set standards and to supervise the private morals of the Nation. In addition, the Justices of this Court seem especially unsuited to make the kind of value judgments—as to what movies are good or bad for local communities—which the concurring opinions appear to require. We are told that the only way we can decide whether a State or municipality can constitutionally bar movies is for this Court to view and appraise each movie on a case-by-case basis. Under these circumstances, every member of the Court must exercise his own judgment as to how bad a picture is, a judgment which is ultimately based at least in large part on his own standard of what is immoral. The end result of such decisions seems to me to be a purely personal determination by individual Justices as to whether a particular picture viewed is too bad to allow it to be seen by the public. Such an individualized determination cannot be guided by reasonably fixed and certain standards. Accordingly, neither States nor moving picture makers can possibly know in advance, with any fair degree of certainty, what can or cannot be done in the field of movie making and exhibiting. This uncertainty cannot easily be reconciled with the rule of law which our Constitution envisages.

The different standards which different people may use to decide about the badness of pictures are well illustrated by the contrasting standards mentioned in the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals and the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Frankfurter here. As I read the New York court's opinion this movie was held immoral and banned because it makes adultery too alluring. Mr. Justice Frankfurter quotes Mr. Lawrence, author of the book from which the movie was made, as believing censorship should be applied only to publications that make sex look ugly, that is, as I understand it, less alluring.

In my judgment, this Court should not permit itself to get into the very center of such policy controversies, which have so little in common with lawsuits.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958—KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORP., APPELLANT, v. THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurring in the result.

As one whose taste in art and literature hardly qualifies him for the avant-garde, I am more than surprised, after viewing the picture, that the New York authorities should have banned "Lady Chatterley's Lover." To assume that this motion picture would have offended Victorian moral sensibilities is to rely only on the stuffiest of Victorian conventions. Whatever one's personal preferences may be about such matters, the refusal to license the exhibition of this picture, on the basis of the 1954 amendment to the New York State education law, can only mean that that enactment forbids the public showing of any film that deals with adultery except by way of sermonizing condemnation or depicts any physical manifestation of an illict amorous relation. Since the denial of a license by the Board of Regents was confirmed by the highest court of the State, I have no choice but to agree with this Court's judgment in holding that the State exceeded the bounds of free expression protected by the "liberty" of the 14th amendment. But I also believe that the Court's opinion takes ground that exceeds the appropriate limits for decision. By way of reinforcing my brother Harlan's objections to the scope of the Court's opinion, I add the following.

Even the author of "Lady Chatterley's Lover" did not altogether rule out censorship, nor was his passionate zeal on behalf of society's profound interest in the endeavors of true artists so doctrinaire as to be unmindful of the facts of life regarding the sordid exploitation of man's nature and impulses. He knew there was such a thing as pornography, dirt for dirt's sake, or, to be more accurate, dirt for money's sake. This is what D. H. Lawrence wrote:

"But even I would censor genuine pornography, rigorously. It would not be very difficult. In the first place, genuine pornography is almost always underworld, it doesn't come into the open. In the second, ion stated: "[I]t is impossible to write off this entire drama as 'mere pornography.'" Judge Van Voorhis, however, would have remitted the case to the board of regents to consider whether certain "passages" in the film "might have been eliminated as 'obscene' without doing violence to constitutional liberties."

[8] This is also emphasized in the brief of counsel for the regents, which states, "The full definition is not before the court—only these parts of the definition as cited—and any debate as to whether other parts of the definition are a proper standard has no bearing in this case."

[9] In concurring, Judge Desmond agreed that this was the meaning of the statutory language in question, and that "the theme and content of this film fairly deserve that characterization."

[10] See by way of contrast, Swearingen v. United States, 161 U.S. 446; United States v. Limehouse, 285 U.S. 424.

[11] Thomas Jefferson wrote more than 150 years ago, "But we have nothing to fear from the demoralizing reasonings of some, if others are left free to demonstrate their errors. And especially when the law stands ready to punish the first criminal act produced by the false reasoning. These are safer correctives than the conscience of a judge." Letter of Thomas Jefferson to Elijah Boardman, July 3, 1801, Jefferson Papers, Library of Congress, vol. 115, folio 19761.

you can recognize it by the insult it offers invariably, to sex, and to the human spirit.

"Pornography is the attempt to insult sex, to do dirt on it. This is unpardonable. Take the very lowest instance, the picture post card sold underhand by the underworld, in most cities. What I have seen of them have been of an ugliness to make you cry. The insult to the human body, the insult to a vital human relationship. Ugly and cheap they make the human nudity ugly and degraded, they make the sexual act trivial and cheap and nasty." (D. H. Lawrence, "Pornography and Obscenity," p. 13.)

This traffic has not lessened since Lawrence wrote. Apparently it is on the increase. In the course of the recent debate in both Houses of Parliament on the obscene publications bill, now on its way to passage, designed to free British authors from the hazards of too rigorous application in our day of Lord Cockburn's ruling, in 1868, in Regina v. Hicklin, L.R. 3 Q.B. 360, weighty experience was adduced regarding the extensive dissemination of pornographic materials.[1] See 597 Parliamentary Debates, H.C., No. 36 (Tuesday, December 16, 1958), cols. 992 et seq., and 216 Parliamentary Debates H.L., No. 77 (Tuesday, June 2, 1959), cols. 489 et seq. Nor is there any reason to believe that on this side of the ocean there has been a diminution in the pornographic business which years ago sought a flourishing market in some of the leading secondary schools for boys, who presumably had more means than boys in the public high schools.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the pertinacious, eloquent and free-spirited promoters of the liberalizing legislation in Great Britain did not conceive the needs of a civilized society, in assuring the utmost freedom to those who make literature and art possible—authors, artists, publishers, producers, booksellers—easily attainable by sounding abstract and unqualified dogmas about freedom. They had a keen awareness that freedom of expression is no more an absolute than any other freedom, an awareness that is reflected in the opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis, to whom we predominantly owe the present constitutional safeguards on behalf of freedom of expression. And see Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697, 715–716, for limitations on constitutionally protected freedom of speech.[2]

In short, there is an evil against which a State may constitutionally protect itself, whatever we may think about the questions of policy involved. The real problem is the formulation of constitutionally allowable safeguards which society may take against evil without impinging upon the necessary dependence of a free society upon the fullest scope of free expression. One cannot read the debates in the House of Commons and the House of Lords and not realize the difficulty of reconciling these conflicting interests, in the framing of legislation on the ends of which there was agreement, even for those who most generously espouse that freedom of expression without which all freedom gradually withers.

It is not our province to meet these recalcitrant problems of legislative drafting. Ours is the vital but very limited task of scrutinizing the work of the draftsmen in order to determine whether they have kept within the narrow limits of the kind of censorship which even D. H. Lawrence deemed necessary. The legislation must not be so vague, the language so loose, as to leave to those who have to apply it too wide a discretion for sweeping within its condemnation what is permissible expression as well as what society may permissibly prohibit. Always remembering that the widest scope of freedom is to be given to the adventurous and imaginative exercise of the human spirit, we have struck down legislation phrased in language intrinsically vague, unless it be responsive to the common understanding of men even though not susceptible of explicit definition. The ultimate reason for invalidating such laws is that they lead to timidity and inertia and thereby discourage the boldness of expression indispensable for a progressive society.

The New York legislation of 1954 was the product of careful lawyers who sought to meet decisions of this Court which had left no doubt that a motion-picture licensing law is not inherently outside the scope of the regulatory powers of a State under the 14th amendment. The Court does not strike the law down because of vagueness, as we struck down prior New York legislation. Nor does it reverse the judgment of the New York Court of Appeals, as I would, because in applying the New York law to "Lady Chatterley's Lover" it applied it to a picture to which it cannot constitutionally be applied without invading the area of constitutionally free express. The difficulty which the Court finds seems to derive from some expressions culled here and there from the opinion of the chief judge of the New York Court of Appeals. This leads the court to give the phrase "acts of sexual immorality * * * as desirable, acceptable or proper patterns of behavior" an innocent content, meaning, in effect, an allowable subject matter for discussion. But, surely, to attribute that result to the decision of the court of appeals, on the basis of a few detached phrases of Chief Judge Conway, is to break a faggot into pieces, is to forget that the meaning of language is to be felt and its phrases not to be treated disjointly. "Sexual immorality" is not a new phrase in this branch of law and its implications dominate the context. I hardly conceive it possible that the Court would strike down as unconstitutional the Federal statute against mailing lewd, obscene, and lascivious matter, which has been the law of the land for nearly a hundred years, see the act of March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. 507, and March 3, 1873, 17 Stat. 599, whatever specific instances may be found not within its allowable prohibition. In sustaining this legislation this Court gave the words "lewd, obscene and lascivious" concreteness by saying that they concern "sexual immorality."

Unless I misread the opinion of the Court, it strikes down the New York legislation in order to escape the task of deciding whether a particular picture is entitled to the protection of expression under the 14th amendment. Such an exercise of the judicial function, however onerous or ungrateful, inheres in the very nature of the judicial enforcement of the due-process clause. We cannot escape such instance-by-instance, case-by-case application of that clause in all the variety of situations that come before this Court. It would be comfortable if, by a comprehensive formula, we could decide when a confession is coerced so as to vitiate a State conviction. There is no such talismanic formula. Every term we have to examine the particular circumstances of a particular case in order to apply generalities which no one disputes. It would be equally comfortable if a general formula could determine the unfairness of a State trial for want of counsel. But, except in capital cases, we have to thread our way, term after term, through the particular circumstances of a particular case in relation to a particular defendant in order to ascertain whether due process was denied in the unique situation before us. We are constantly called upon to consider the alleged misconduct of a prosecutor as vitiating the fairness of a particular trial or the inflamed state of public opinion in a particular case as undermining the constitutional right to due process. Again, in the series of cases coming here from the State courts, in which due process was invoked to enforce separation of church and state, decision certainly turned on the particularities of the specific situations before the Court. It is needless to multiply instances. It is the nature of the concept of due process, and I venture to believe its high serviceability in our constitutional system that the judicial enforcement of the due-process clause is the very antithesis of a Procrustean rule. This was recognized in the first full-dress discussion of the due-process clause of the 14th amendment when the Court defined the nature of the problem as a "gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasons on which such decision may be founded" (Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U.S. 97, 104). The task is onerous and exacting, demanding as it does the utmost discipline in objectivity, the severest control of personal predilections. But it cannot be escaped, not even by disavowing that such is the nature of our task.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958—KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORPORATION, APPELLANT, v. THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Douglas, with whom Mr. Justice Black joins, concurring.

While I join in the opinion of the Court, I adhere to the views I expressed in Superior Films v. Department of Education, 346 U.S. 587, 588–589, that censorship of movies is unconstitutional, since it is a form of "previous restraint" that is as much at war with the 1st amendment, made applicable to the States through the 14th, as the censorship struck down in Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697. If a particular movie violates a valid law, the exhibitor can be prosecuted in the usual way. I can find in the 1st amendment no room for any censor whether he is scanning an editorial, reading a news broadcast, editing a novel or a play, or previewing a movie.

Reference is made to British law and British practice. But they have little relevance to our problem, since we live under a written Constitution. What is entrusted to the keeping of the legislature in England is protected from legislative interference or regulation here. As we stated in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 265, "No purpose in ratifying the Bill of Rights was clearer than that of securing for the people of the United States much greater freedom of religion, expression, assembly, and petition than the people of Great Britain had ever enjoyed." If we had a provision in our Constitution for "reasonable" regulation of the press such as India has included in hers,[1] there would be room for argument that censorship in the interests of morality would be permissible. Judges sometimes try to read the word "reasonable" into the first amendment or make the rights it grants subject to reasonable regulation (see Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250, 262; Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494, 523–525); or supply to the States a watered-down version of the first amendment. See Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 505–506. But its language, in terms that are absolute, is utterly at war with censorship. Different questions may arise as to censorship of some news when the Nation is actually at war. But any possible exceptions are extremely limited. That is why the tradition represented by Near v. Minnesota, supra, represents our constitutional ideal.

[2] "The objection has also been made that the principle as to immunity from previous restraint is stated too broadly, if every such restraint is deemed to be prohibited. That is undoubtedly true; the protection even as to previous restraint is not absolutely unlimited. But the limitation has been recognized only in exceptional cases" (283 U.S., at 715–716).

[1] Sec. 19(2) of the Indian Constitution permits "reasonable restrictions" on the exercise of the right of freedom of speech and expression in the interests, inter alia, of decency or morality * * * defamation or incitement to an offense." This limitation is strictly construed; any restriction amounting to an "imposition" which will "operate harshly" on speech or the press will be held invalid. See Seshadri v. District Magistrate, Tangore, 41 A.I.R. (Sup. Ct.) 747, 749.

Happily Government censorship has put down few roots in this country. The American tradition is represented by Near v. Minnesota, supra. See Lockhart and McClure, "The Law of Obscenity," 38 Minn. L. Rev. 295, 324–325; Alpert, "Judicial Censorship of Obscene Literature," 52 Harv. L. Rev. 30, 53 et seq. We have in the United States no counterpart of the Lord Chamberlain who is censor over England's stage. As late as 1941 only six States had systems of censorship for movies. Chafee, "Free Speech in the United States (1941)," p. 540. That number has now been reduced to four[2]—Kansas, Maryland, New York, and Virginia—plus a few cities. Even in these areas, censorship of movies shown on television gives way by reason of the Federal Communications Act. See Allen B. Dumont Laboratories v. Carroll, 184 F. 2d 153. And from what information is available, movie censors do not seem to be very active.[3] Deletion of the residual part of censorship that remains would constitute the elimination of an institution that intrudes on first amendment rights.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No. 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958—KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORPORATION, APPELLANT, v. THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Clark, concurring in the result.

I can take the words of the majority of the New York Court of Appeals only in their clear, unsophisticated, and common meaning. They say that sections 122 and 122–a of New York's education law "require the denial of a license to motion pictures which are immoral in that they portray 'acts of sexual immorality * * * as desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior.'" That court states the issue in the case in this language:

"Moving pictures are our only concern and, what is more to the point, only those motion pictures which alluringly present acts of sexual immorality as proper behavior."

Moreover, it is significant to note that in its 14-page opinion that court says again and again, in fact 15 times, that the picture "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is proscribed because of its espousal of sexual immorality as desirable or as proper conduct for the people of our State.[1]

[1] The phrase is not always identical but varies from the words of the statute "acts of sexual immorality * * * as desirable, acceptable, or proper patterns of behavior," to such terms "as proper conduct for the people of our State"; "exaltation of illicit sexual love in derogation of the restraints of marriage"; "as a proper pattern of behavior"; "the espousal of sexually immoral acts"; "which debase fundamental sexual morality by portraying its converse to the people as alluring and desirable"; "which alluringly portrays sexually immoral acts as proper behavior"; "by presenting * * * [adultery] in a clearly approbatory manner"; "which alluringly portrays adultery as proper behavior"; "which alluringly portray acts of sexual immorality (here adultery) and recommend them as a proper way of life"; "which alluringly portray adultery as proper and desirable"; and "which alluringly portray acts of sexual immorality by adultery as proper behavior."

The minority of my brothers here, however, twist this holding into one that New York's act requires "obscenity or incitement, not just abstract expressions of opinion." But I cannot so obliterate the repeated declarations above-mentioned that were made not only 15 times by the court of appeals but which were the basis of the board of regent's decision as well. Such a construction would raise many problems, not the least of which would be our failure to accept New York's interpretation of the scope of its own act. I feel, as does the majority here, bound by their holding.

In this context, the act comes within the ban of Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. (1952). We held there that "expression by means of motion pictures is included within the free speech and free press guaranty of the first and and fourteenth amendments." Id., at 502. Referring to Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), we said that while "a major purpose of the first amendment guaranty of a free press was to prevent prior restraints upon publication" such protection was not unlimited but did place on the State a heavy burden to demonstrate that the limitation challenged was exceptional. Id., at 503–504. The standard applied there was the word sacrilegious and we found it set the censor adrift upon a a boundless sea amid a myriad of conflicting currents of religious views. Id., at 504. We struck it down.

Here the standard is the portrayal of "acts of sexual immorality * * * as desirable, acceptable or proper patterns of behavior." Motion picture plays invariably have a hero, a villain, supporting characters, a location, a plot, a diversion from the main theme and usually a moral. As we said in Burstyn: "They may affect public attitudes and behavior in a variety of ways, ranging from direct espousal of a political or social doctrine to the subtle shaping of thought which characterizes all artistic expression" (343 U.S., at 501.) What may be to one viewer the glorification of an idea as being "desirable, acceptable or proper" may to the notions of another be entirely devoid of such a teaching. The only limits on the censor's discretion is his understanding of what is included within the term "desirable, acceptable, or proper." This is nothing less than a roving commission in which individual impressions become the yardstick of action, and results in regulation in accordance with the beliefs of the individual censor rather than regulation by law. Even here three of my brothers "cannot regard this film as depicting anything more than a somewhat unusual, and rather pathetic, 'love triangle.'" At least three—perhaps four—of the members of New York's highest court thought otherwise. I need only say that the obscurity of the standard presents such a choice of difficulties that even the most experienced find themselves at dagger's point.

It may be, as Chief Judge Conway said, "that our public morality, possibly more than ever before, needs every protection government can give." And, as my brother Harlan points out, "each time such a statute is struck down, the State is left in more confusion." This is true where broad grounds are employed leaving no indication as to what may be necessary to meet the requirements of due process. I see no grounds for confusion, however, were a statute to ban "pornographic" films, or those that "portray acts of sexual immorality, perversion, or lewdness." If New York's statute had been so construed by its highest court I believe it would have met the requirements of due process. Instead, it placed more emphasis on what the film teaches than on what it depicts. There is where the confusion enters. For this reason, I would reverse on the authority of Burstyn.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES—No 394—OCTOBER TERM, 1958—KINGSLEY INTERNATIONAL PICTURES CORP., APPELLANT, THE REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK—JUNE 29, 1959

Mr. Justice Harlan, whom Mr. Justice Frankfurter and Mr. Justice Whittaker join, concurring in the result.

I think the Court has moved too swiftly in striking down a statute which is the product of a deliberate and conscientious effort on the part of New York to meet constitutional objections raised by this Court's decisions respecting predecessor statutes in this field. But although I disagree with the Court that the parts of sections 122 and 122–a of the New York education law, 16 N.Y. Laws Ann. section 122 (McKinney 1953), 16 N.Y. Laws Ann. section 122–a (McKinney supp. 1958), here particularly involved are unconstitutional on their face, I believe that in their application to this film constitutional bounds were exceeded.

I

Section 122–a of the State education law was passed in 1954 to meet this Court's decision in Commercial Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 346 U.S. 587, which overturned the New York Court of Appeals' holding in Matter of Commercial Pictures Corp v. Board of Regents, 305 N.Y. 336, 113 N.E. 2d 502, that the film La Ronde could be banned as "immoral" and as "tend[ing] to corrupt morals," under section 122.[1] The Court's decision in Commercial Pictures was but a one line per curiam with a citation to Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, which in turn had held for naught not the word "immoral" but the term "sacrilegious" in the statute.

New York, nevertheless, set about repairing its statute. This it did by enacting section 122–a which in the respects emphasized in the present opinion of Chief Judge Conway as pertinent here defines an "immoral" motion picture film as one which portrays "acts of sexual immorality * * * (as desirable, acceptable or proper patterns of behavior'" (4 N.Y. 2d 349, 351, 151 N.E. 2d 197.)[2] The Court now holds this part of

[1] Section 122 provides: "The director of the [motion picture] division or, when authorized by the regents, the officers of a local office or bureau shall cause to be promptly examined every motion picture film submitted to them as herein required, and unless such film or a part thereof is obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, sacrilegious, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime, shall issue a license therefor. If such director or, when so authorized, such officer shall not license any film submitted, he shall furnish to the applicant therefor a written report of the reasons for his refusal and a description of each rejected part of a film not rejected in toto."

[2] Sec. 122–a provides:

"1. For the purpose of sec. 122 of this chapter, the term 'immoral' and the phrase 'of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals' shall denote a motion picture film or part thereof, the dominant purpose or effect of which is erotic or pornographic; or which portrays acts of sexual immorality, perversion, or lewdness, or which expressly or impliedly presents such acts as

New York's effort unconstitutional on its face under the 14th amendment. I cannot agree.

The court does not suggest that these provisions are bad for vagueness.[3] Any such suggestion appears to me untenable in view of the long-standing usage in this court of the concept "sexual immorality" to explain in part the meaning of "obscenity." See, e.g., Swearingen v. United States, 161 U.S. 446, 451.[4] Instead, the court finds a constitutional vice in these provisions in that they require, so it is said, neither "obscenity" nor incitement to "sexual immorality," but strike of their own force at the mere advocacy of "an idea—that adultery under certain circumstances may be proper behavior"; expressions of "opinion that adultery may sometimes be proper." I think this characterization of these provisions misconceives the construction put upon them by the prevailing opinions in the court of appeals. Granting that the abstract public discussion or advocacy of adultery, unaccompanied by obscene portrayal or actual incitement to such behavior, may not constitutionally be proscribed by the State, I do not read those opinions to hold that the statute on its face undertakes any such proscription. Chief Judge Conway's opinion, which was joined by two others of the seven judges of the court of appeals, and in the thrust of which one more concurred, to be sure with some doubt, states (4 N.Y. 2d, at 356, 151 N.E. 2d, at 200):

"It should first be emphasized that the scope of section 122–a is not mere expression of opinion in the form, for example, of a filmed lecture whose subject matter is the espousal of adultery. We reiterate that this case involves the espousal of sexually immoral acts (here adultery) plus actual scenes of a suggestive and obscene nature."

The opinion elsewhere, as indeed is also the case with sections 122 and 122–a themselves when independently read in their entirety, is instinct with the notion that mere abstract expressions of opinion regarding the desirability of sexual immorality, unaccompanied by obscenity[5] or incitement, are not proscribed. See 4 N.Y. 2d 349, especially at 351–352, 354, 356–358, 361, 363–364, 151 N.E. 2d 197, at 197, 199, 200–201, 203, 204–205; and notes 1 and 2, supra. It is the corruption of public morals, occasioned by the inciting effect of a particular portrayal or by what New York has deemed the necessary effect of obscenity, at which the statute is aimed. In the words of Chief Judge Conway, "There is no difference in substance between motion pictures which are corruptive of the public morals, and sexually suggestive, because of a predominance of suggestive scenes, and those which achieve precisely the same effect by presenting only several such scenes in a clearly approbatory manner throughout the course of the film. The law is concerned with effect, not merely with but one means of producing it * * * the objection lies in the corrosive effect upon the public sense of sexual morality" (4 N.Y. 2d, at 358, 151 N.E. 2d, at 201).

I do not understand that the Court would question the constitutionality of the particular portions of the statute with which we are here concerned if the Court read, as I do, the majority opinions in the Court of Appeals as construing these provisions to require obscenity or incitement, not just mere abstract expressions of opinion. It is difficult to understand why the Court should strain to read those opinions as it has. Our usual course in constitutional adjudication is precisely the opposite.

II

The application of the statute to this film is quite a different matter. I have heretofore ventured the view that in this field the States have wider constitutional latitude than the Federal Government. See the writer's separate opinion in Roth v. United States and Alberts v. California, 354 U.S. 476, 496. With that approach, I have viewed this film.

Giving descriptive expression to what in matters of this kind are in the last analysis bound to be but individual subjective impressions, objectively as one may try to discharge his duty as a judge, is not apt to be repaying. I shall therefore content myself with saying that, according full respect to, and with, I hope, sympathetic consideration for, the views and characterizations expressed by others, I cannot regard this film as depicting anything more than a somewhat unusual, and rather pathetic "love triangle," lacking in anything that could properly be termed obscene or corruptive of the public morals by inciting the commission of adultery. I therefore think that in banning this film New York has exceeded constitutional limits.

I conclude with one further observation. It is sometimes said that this Court should shun considering the particularities of individual cases in this difficult field lest the Court become a final "board of censorship." But I cannot understand why it should be thought that the process of constitutional judgment in this realm somehow stands apart from that involved in other fields, particularly those presenting questions of due process. Nor can I see, short of holding that all State "censorship" laws are constitutionally impermissible, a course from which the Court is carefully abstaining, how the Court can hope ultimately to spare itself the necessity for individualized adjudication. In the very nature of things the problems in this area are ones of individual cases, see Roth v. United States and Alberts v. California, supra, at 496–498, for a "censorship" statute can hardly be contrived that would in effect be self-executing. And, lastly, each time such a statute is struck down, the State is left in more confusion, as witness New York's experience with its statute.

Because I believe the New York statute was unconstitutionally applied in this instance I concur in the judgment of the Court.

desirable, acceptable or proper patterns of behavior.

"2. For the purpose of sec. 122 of this chapter, the term 'incite to crime' shall denote a motion picture the dominant purpose or effect of which is to suggest that the commission of criminal acts or contempt for law is profitable, desirable, acceptable, or respectable behavior; or which advocates or teaches the use of, or the methods of use of, narcotics or habit-forming drugs."

[3] The bill that became sec. 122–a was introduced at the request of the State Education Department, which noted in a memorandum that "the issue of censorship, as such, is not involved in this bill. This bill merely attempts to follow out the criticism of the U.S. Supreme Court by defining the words 'immoral' and 'incite to crime.'" N.Y.S. Legis. Ann., 1954, 36. In a memorandum accompanying his approval of the measure, the then Governor of New York, himself a lawyer, wrote:

"Since 1921, the education law of this State has required the licensing of motion pictures and authorized refusal of a license for a motion picture which is 'obscene, indecent, immoral' or which would 'tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime.'

"Recent Supreme Court decisions have indicated that the term 'immoral' may not be sufficiently definite for constitutional purposes. The primary purpose of this bill is to define 'immoral' and 'tend to corrupt morals' in conformance with the apparent requirements of these cases. It does so by defining them in terms of 'sexual immorality.' The words selected for this definition are based on judicial opinions which have given exhaustive and reasoned treatment to the subject.

"The bill does not create any new licensing system, expand the scope of motion picture censorship, or enlarge the area of permissible prior restraint. Its sole purpose is to give to the section more precision to make it conform to the tenor of recent court decisions and proscribe the exploitation of 'filth for the sake of filth.' It does so as accurately as language permits in 'words well understood through long use.' [People v. Winters, 333 U.S. 507, 518 (1948)].

* * * * *

"The language of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a recent opinion of this precise problem, should be noted:

"'To hold that liberty of expression by means of motion pictures is guaranteed by the 1st and 14th amendments, however, is not the end of our problem. It does not follow that the Constitution requires absolute freedom to exhibit every motion picture of every kind at all times and all places.' [Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, at 502].

"So long as the State has the responsibility for interdicting motion pictures which transgress the bounds of decency, we have the responsibility of furnishing guide lines to the agency charged with enforcing the law." Id., at 408.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill H.R. 7379, with amendments.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENDING AIR POLLUTION CONTROL ACT

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7476) to extend for 2 additional years the authority of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service with respect to air pollution control.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(a) of the Act entitled "An Act to provide research and technical assistance relating to air pollution control", approved July 14, 1955 (42 U.S.C. 1857d), is amended (1) by striking out "five" and inserting in lieu thereof "seven" and (2) by striking out "June 30, 1960" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1962".

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, carrying out the suggestion of the Speaker of a few moments ago, which I thought appropriate, we shall take only a very few minutes of the 40 minutes granted under the rule.

This bill merely extends for 2 additional years the authority of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service with respect to air pollution control. We have had such a program for the past 4 years which expires with the end of this year. Consequently it was felt advisable to extend this program for an additional period of time.

The Subcommittee on Health and Safety conducted hearings, considered this bill at length and reported to the committee. It has done an excellent job. I want to compliment the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBERTS], the chairman of the subcommittee, and the members of the subcommittee for the fine work they have done in reporting this legislation.

The Federal program for assistance in the control of air pollution was set up by Public Law 159 of the 84th Congress. Under that act the Public Health Service is authorized to conduct a program of research, technical assistance, and training.

The act, passed in 1955, provided for a 5-year program and authorized appropriations of $5 million a year for that period, so that authority for appropriations expires with this fiscal year. Passage of the pending legislation would permit appropriations at the rate of $5 million a year for 2 additional years.

Public Law 159 specifically declares it to be the policy of Congress to preserve and protect the primary responsibility and rights of the States and local governments in controlling air pollution.

This problem, however, does not always respect local and State boundaries. Air pollution has become a national problem in which we need the guidance and assistance of scientists in the Public Health Service.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare recommended to the committee that the Surgeon General be given permanent authority to conduct the air pollution program and that the ceiling on appropriations be eliminated. The committee, however, is recommending a 2-year extension to give the appropriate committees an opportunity to review the program in the next Congress.

As the committee report shows, the Public Health Service spent approximately $1.7 million during fiscal year 1956; $2.7 million in 1957; $4 million for each of 1958 and 1959; and has budgeted $4,212,000 for the current fiscal year. Thus, a continuation of the $5 million annual limitation should impose no hardships in continuing this program.

The quality of the air we breathe affects all of us. With the increased concentration of our people in urban areas, the harmful effects of air pollution threatens more and more of our population.

In carrying out the directive of Congress, the Public Health Service has set up a large number of research projects to investigate the causes, nature, extent, effects, and control of air pollution. The projects are being conducted in Public Health Service laboratories but also through contract and financial support of projects in other Federal agencies, in universities and research institutes, or wherever specific competencies and facilities exist. There are nearly 200 of these projects, involving the facilities of the Public Health Service and over 50 universities and other research organizations. In addition, one project alone, the national air sampling network, involves over 160 local health and air pollution agencies in sampling of air contaminants in all the States and Puerto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to extend the present Federal air pollution control program for 2 years.

Under Public Law 159, 84th Congress, approved July 14, 1955, appropriations of $5 million a year were authorized for 5 years to assist in the formulation and execution of air pollution abatement and research programs. Authority for appropriations expire this fiscal year.

This act vests in the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, specific authority to conduct a program of research and technical assistance relating to air pollution.

The law authorizes the Surgeon General to conduct the following programs:

First. Prepare and recommend research programs designed to reduce or eliminate air pollution.

Second. Collect and disseminate information relating to air pollution.

Third. Conduct technical research in the Public Health Service and support, by grants-in-aid and by contract, technical research programs of both public and private agencies relating to air pollution.

Fourth. On request of a State or local government air pollution control agency, investigate and survey any specific air pollution problem facing the requesting agency.

Fifth. Prepare and publish reports or surveys, studies, investigations, and research done under this law.

Under this program, approximately $1.7 million was expended during fiscal year 1956; $2.7 million for 1957; $4 million for each of 1958 and 1959; and the budget for the current fiscal year is $4,212,000.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Bureau of the Budget favor extending Public Law 159, 84th Congress, on a permanent basis, and eliminating the ceiling on appropriations. The committee, however, is recommending a 2-year extension of the act, without increasing the ceiling on appropriations.

While significant progress has been made in recent years in developing and improving the techniques for controlling air pollution, more basic knowledge of the effects of air pollutants on humans is needed in many areas. We need, also, to know more about the effect of air pollutants on agriculture. It is estimated that in the Los Angeles area alone that air pollution results in a loss of $5 million a year to agriculture.

No one, of course, expects that the problems confronting us can be solved in 2 years, but a 2-year extension will enable the committee to review the program in the next Congress and to go into more detail regarding recommendations made by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and others concerned about the problem of air pollution.

Air pollution is a national problem. It affects the total human environment. All affected interests must cooperate in seeking effective solutions.

Since 1955, the accelerated program of the Public Health Service has assisted the various agencies and groups concerned in developing information on the problems and in contributing to their solution.

Valuable information has been provided about the extent of air pollution in the United States, and about practical means of measuring, assessing, and controlling air pollution.

Specific information or indications have come out of some of the research that certain pollutants in the air have affected health, as in the case of the drastic air pollution episodes in Donora, Pa., and London, England. These pollutants have increased the death rates, particularly during the period of the smog, and more particularly in old and debilitated people. But most of the health effects of air pollutants are much more subtle than that. They are long-term detractors of good health. In the hearings, the subcommittee was told that it is known there are pollutants in the air which cause cancer, particularly in laboratory animals, and that death rates for certain types of cancer and respiratory conditions are greater in urban areas where the smog is more common.

Valuable information has been developed about ways in which air pollution subtly affects human health, including specific knowledge about the effects of agents such as ozone and sulfur dioxide, which are directly toxic and physiologically damaging, and certain olefin compounds which can cause eye irritation in humans and serious toxic effects in experimental animals.

States and communities have taken advantage of, and benefited by, the technical assistance offered by the Public Health Service.

This has led to the appraisal of many local and regional air pollution problems and contributed toward appropriate local action.

Many research projects under way relate to the causes, nature, extent, effects, and control of air pollution. The projects are being conducted not only in the Public Health Service laboratories, but also through contract and grant support of projects in other Federal agencies, in universities and research institutes, or wherever specific competencies and facilities exist. There are nearly 200 of these projects, involving the Public Health Service facilities and over 50 universities and other research organizations. In addition, one project alone, the national air sampling network, involves over 160 local health and air pollution agencies in the sampling of air contaminants in all the States and Puerto Rico.

Medical research is concerned not only with those well-known acute air pollution episodes which resulted in sudden death—ranging from 20 fatalities in Donora—1948—to 4,000 or more in a single week in London—1952—but also with the potentially greater problem of long-term cumulative injury to community populations from day-after-day exposure to air pollution.

Two principal kinds of studies have been intiated, first, statistical and epidemiological studies designed to determine the extent to which variations in community health are related to air pollution indexes; and, second, laboratory studies to determine the effects on health of certain constituents of polluted air—alone and in combination—known or suspected to be potentially harmful. Thus, the health studies program is divided into epidemiology and laboratory investigations, with such activities as lung function testing falling into both groups.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce recommends enactment of this legislation so that additional appropriations can be made for this important work by the Surgeon General during fiscal years 1961 and 1962.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, our Subcommittee on Health and Safety conducted rather extensive hearings on this bill. I believe the bill has great merit and urge its approval.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. This is getting to be a pretty expensive program, is it not? I totaled up the figures and including the budget for the fiscal year 1960, it runs to some $12½ million actual spending. Is that correct or are my figures wrong?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not have my figures at hand; does the gentleman mean for the past programs?

Mr. GROSS. For the past programs and for the fiscal year 1960.

Mr. SCHENCK. This legislation merely extends the present authorized program for a 2-year period beginning July 1, 1960. It is necessary to do that in order for the Public Health Service to make its case before the Committee on Appropriations early in the next session of Congress.

Mr. GROSS. The appropriation for this purpose is going up all the time. It went up from $4 million for 2 years, 1958 and 1959, to $4,212,000 for fiscal year 1960 alone. Can the gentleman foresee any end to this?

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTS. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that this is a most modest approach that has been made. The other body passed a bill calling for 4 years at the rate of $7½ million a year.

The budget said that there should be no ceiling on the appropriation and the committee took the view that we could hold it down to $5 million a year. I will say to the gentleman further that the matter of air pollution is growing, but we do not want to authorize more than is needed to accomplish the desired results in handling the problem of air pollution.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I am not very much impressed, I will say to the gentleman, by the fact that the other body asked for a much higher expenditure for this purpose. It seems to me all the Members are pretty well acquainted with the fact that the other body is notorious for upping appropriations and spending money for purposes of this kind. I still have no answer to my question as to how long this is going on and how much money is going to be spent in this connection?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, may I say in answer to my colleague from Iowa that this is an authorization bill not to exceed $5 million each for 2 years, and that it will be entirely up to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to justify its own request, and that we, as Members of the Congress, will have full opportunity to study the budget or the Appropriation Committee recommendations at the proper time.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the RECORD should show, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, that there are certain areas in the United States where this problem is extremely serious. For example, on the coast of California, it has been brought to the attention of the committee that it is growing more and more serious all the time. In the State of Pennsylvania, there are certain areas that have the same problem. There are other areas of the United States that have this problem. It is those areas where there is such a serious problem concerning the health and welfare of the people that have brought this problem to our committee and caused the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to make this request.

The SPEAKER. The question is: Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RICE MARKETING QUOTAS

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7889) to require marketing quotas for rice when the total supply exceeds the normal supply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That section 354 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out of subsection (a) thereof the words "by more than 10 per centum".

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. This bill is unique in several respects. For one thing, it is not opposed as such by anybody as far as I have heard. For another, it is designed to lower surplus stocks of rice by as much as 50 percent without costing anybody anything except possibly some people in the warehouse business. It passed the Committee on Agriculture unanimously, and it has the favorable endorsement of the Department of Agriculture.

Those two facts, I think, are pretty nearly unique.

Mr. Speaker, under the present law, marketing quotas do not go into effect until the normal supply of rice is exceeded by more than 10 percent. One purpose of that excess 10 percent was to give the Department some extra latitude before the old escalator clause would go into effect. This clause no longer applies to rice. Therefore, there is no remaining reason to continue the 10 percent surplus, and this bill now under consideration removes it.

Mr. Speaker, I would call to your attention the fact that the rice industry has always stood on its own two feet. It would, if it were permitted, get out from under controls of every character within the next few years. We tried to do that for the industry through what is known as the domestic allotment plan. The surplus in rice is virtually nil. The industry in the case of the present bill would profit only remotely and the farmers would not profit at all. The industry would profit because orderly marketing would come about more quickly.

Mr. Speaker, I see no reason to continue the present situation unless you like surpluses and want them continued.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I think the record shows very clearly that the Republican Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, has offered none and hindered all efforts to have a rounded, overall, complete agricultural program.

We have here today a measure the merits of which have been well explained by its very able author. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMPSON] has an outstanding record of voting and working for measures of overall national benefit. But I think it is also well at this time to point out that the road to the solution of the farm problem is not piecemeal legislation. The treatment of the problem under the present Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, has had the result of hurting the farmers and making the consumers and urban groups feel more burdened by the taxes they have had to pay to support the farm program.

So I cannot help but express at this time on behalf of many people on this side the feeling that the welfare of our country demands the kind of leadership that will not continue piecemeal farm legislation but that believes in farm legislation that will really do the job.

Many of us, I believe, hope and will certainly fight in the next session of Congress for that kind of allover program. We want a bill that will help the farmer.

Those of us who come from city areas want to work with the farming groups on a program that we may be able to support in the name of the consumers whom we represent; and I would just simply emphasize once again that as far as I personally am concerned, and I think I speak for a few others, the time for piecemeal legislation has come to an end.

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SANTANGELO. I wish to associate myself with the views expressed by the gentleman from California. As a member of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture I have been deeply concerned with this problem of piecemeal legislation. It is high time we took a definite stand to solve the problem of the farmers which will be satisfactory to the farmers and to the consumers in the big cities. I agree with the gentleman and I think it is high time that the Democratic Party took that leadership to bring out an all-inclusive agricultural bill.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank the gentleman. I would simply reiterate that we must point out to the country that the Republican leadership has given us no such program and therefore they will have to look to the Democratic Party for this program.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the political speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT]. I have been one of those who has tried desperately hard to keep the farm problem out of politics.

The gentleman does confess that there is a duty upon the majority party to present comprehensive farm legislation which can actually be enacted into law.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEVEN. I yield.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. If it cannot be enacted into law, it is only because of the threat of veto by the present administration. All I can say is we should present it as an issue in 1960 and get a President who will sign it into law and a Secretary of Agriculture who will put it into effect.

Mr. HOEVEN. Again the gentleman has sounded a political note which has no business in discussion of farm legislation.

The gentleman has admitted that there is a duty upon the majority party to enact legislation. Let me remind the gentleman, that the Democrats have complete control of the Committees on Agriculture in both the House and the Senate, and they have complete control of the Congress. They have the votes to enact any kind of farm program if they choose so to do. Incidentally, they also have the votes to override a veto.

But getting to the bill presently before us, this is a good piece of legislation.

Full hearings were held on the bill. It was supported by virtually all organizations representing the rice producers of this country, as well as having the approval of practically all of the farm organizations. Not a single witness appeared in opposition to this legislation.

The bill has the full approval of the Department of Agriculture and it recommends the enactment of this legislation. The most important thing of all is that the bill will cut the cost of CCC holdings of surplus rice. The bill is a step in the right direction and I urge the enactment of the legislation.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to this discussion of the need for an overall program on agriculture. Not all of us on the Committee on Agriculture, of course, have been in favor of what is going on. I myself have a few suggestions along that line. At least the gentlemen who have spoken have not opposed this bill, and I want to say to them I appreciate their forbearance and trust that another year and in another session we can bring in a complete farm bill that will suit the purposes of the city boys and those of us who are from the country, too.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GATHINGS. I want to commend the gentleman from Texas for bringing this bill to the floor. It is very meritorious legislation.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. As I understand this bill, it will reduce the overall cost of the Commodity Credit Corporation in its price-support program, and would be of benefit to the taxpayers of this country?

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. YATES. May I say to the gentleman I favor the bill and will vote for it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SANTANGELO), there were—ayes 122, noes 26.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 330, nays 52, not voting 53, as follows:

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 8639) to create an Agricultural Research and Development Commission, to provide for more effective research programs designed to expand markets for agricultural and forestry products, to reduce surpluses, to increase farm income, and to benefit consumers, and for other purposes, with a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

DECLARATIONS AND FINDINGS

SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States hereby makes the following declarations and findings concerning the development of expanded markets for American farm products:

(a) It is in the national interest of the United States to increase the level of farm income in order that farmers may share equitably in the general prosperity of the Nation.

(b) It is in the national interest that the United States have efficient, low-cost agricultural production and distribution, not only to increase farm income through reduced costs and expanded markets, but also to benefit consumers through such efficient operations.

(c) Research can make major contributions toward expanding markets, increasing farm income, benefiting consumers, and reducing surpluses through greater utilization, by its influence in cutting the costs and improving the methods of producing, marketing, processing, and distributing farm products, and by its influence on quality and also on new and improved processes and products.

(d) Development of expanded industrial and other uses for farm products, and of new products from agricultural commodities, will enlarge income opportunities for farmers. It will also reduce the need for Government acquisition, storage, and ultimate disposition of commodities now in surplus.

(e) The expansion of markets for agricultural products requires that they be competitive as to quality of the raw product and as to quality at every subsequent stage of processing and distribution, and as to new and improved products.

(f) Because in many instances the relationship of price and quality exert a powerful influence on consumer acceptance and market volume, research should be directed toward reducing the costs of producing, marketing, processing, and distributing and to improve methods to pave the way to higher per-family farm income.

(g) A dynamic agricultural research program requires a balance of effort between production, marketing, and utilization research—including, but not restricted to, nutritional research, industrial research, and product development—and between basic and applied studies, that most effectively meets the problems and needs of agriculture and of individual commodities and farm situations at all times.

(h) Public and private research agencies, including the Department of Agriculture, the land-grant colleges, other universities and research institutions, as well as private firms, can and should be utilized for an all-out research effort on agriculture's problems and opportunities. All phases of agricultural research, experimentation and testing, marketing and market development, pilot plant, product development, and trial commercialization with corollary economic and related studies should be included in this research effort. Facilities should be established as needed to permit adequate experimentation and testing, and production and market development, or promising new and improved products, and the evaluation of new and improved processes.

PURPOSES

SEC. 2. The purposes of this Act are to promote the increased effectiveness of agricultural research, including forestry, and thereby to expand the markets for and increase the utilization of farm and forest products, increase farm income opportunities, benefit consumers, and strengthen the national economy.

COMMISSION CREATED

SEC. 3. There is hereby created an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government to be known as the Agricultural Research and Development Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"), which shall be composed of seven members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall serve at the pleasure of the President, and one of whom he shall designate as chairman. The first members of the Commission shall be appointed for terms of one, two, and three years, respectively, from the date of the enactment of this Act, the term of each to be designated by the President. Their successors shall be appointed for terms of three years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed: Provided, That upon the expiration of his term of office a member shall continue to serve until his successor shall have been appointed and shall have qualified. A vacancy in the Commission shall not impair the right and duty of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Commission.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. (a) The Commission shall have the duty of appraising agriculture's research needs, opportunities, and accomplishments and developing authoritative recommendations and reports thereon. This appraisal shall include the effectiveness of current research programs, to meet existing problems and to achieve the fullest potentialities of agriculture. The Commission shall recommend areas of research which should be initiated, expanded, terminated, or redirected.

(b) In the discharge of these duties the Commission is empowered to:

(1) Consult with the officials of the United States Department of Agriculture, land-grant colleges, other universities, and research institutions, trade associations and private firms, and others performing or sponsoring research on agricultural commodities or problems.

(2) When it deems necessary, meet with the Commodity Research Advisory Committees of the Department of Agriculture.

(3) Seek advice from general farm organizations, commodity organizations, industry associations and organizations, scientific societies, specialists and experts, and others who can contribute to developing dynamic and efficient programs of agricultural research.

(c) The Commission shall emphasize in its studies and reports, ways and means for increased industrial utilization of agricultural products. The Commission shall also emphasize in its studies and reports major problem areas for agricultural research, opportunities to reduce cost and improve quality, and problems of marketing and merchandising agricultural commodities. The Commission shall recommend the nature and extent of agricultural research which may be effectively conducted in foreign countries with foreign currencies available to the United States.

(d) The Commission shall include in its reports recommendations on the proper balance in research effort on both agricultural and commodity problems, including the emphasis needed in production, marketing, utilization, and home economics research, and the balance between applied and basic studies, from time to time, and such other recommendations as it deems appropriate or necessary.

(e) The Commission shall review the organizational structure of the Department of Agriculture charged with the administration of research in the Department and make recommendations to the Secretary of Agriculture for changes therein which will facilitate administration and strengthen the research program of the Department.

(f) The Commission may obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946, as amended (5 U.S.C. 55a), and such experts and consultants shall receive the same compensation and reimbursement for expenses as that provided in section 6(c) of the Act of July 10, 1953, c. 184.

SALARIES, EMPLOYEES, ETC.

SEC. 5. (a) Members of the Commission shall receive the same compensation and reimbursement for expenses as that provided in section 6(c) of the Act of July 10, 1953, c. 184.

(b) There shall be an Executive Director of the Commission who shall be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture from among persons nominated by the Commission, and who shall serve at the pleasure of the Commission. The Executive Director shall be appointed without regard to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, and shall receive an annual salary not to exceed $19,000.

(c) The Commission shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the provisions of the civil service laws but in conformity with the standards set forth in the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, except that not more than five professional positions may be established at a level of compensation equivalent to the position of GS–18 in the classified service.

(d) The employees of the Commission, including the executive director of the Commission, while traveling on official business and away from their designated post of duty shall be allowed, in lieu of their actual expenses for subsistence and all fees or tips to porters and stewards, a per diem allowance and transportation expense equivalent to that prescribed for civilian officers and employees of the Department of Agriculture. Said employees shall be subject to the provisions of and entitled to the benefits under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 22, 1920, as amended.

(e) The Commission may make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for such books of reference, periodicals, and for printing and binding) as may be necessary to carry out its functions under this Act.

MEETINGS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 6. The Commission shall meet at least four times each year and at such other times as it deems necessary.

REPORTS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 7. The Commission shall make an annual report (and such other reports as is deemed necessary) to the Secretary of Agriculture and Congress not later than June 30 of each year. The annual report shall include an analysis of the research program necessary to meet the needs of agriculture and an appraisal of the benefits to be obtained in relation to the cost of such program, with special emphasis on the industrial utilization of agricultural products.

LIMITATION UPON POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 8. The Commission shall not conduct or administer research.

ADDITIONAL AUTHORITIES

SEC. 9. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and empowered:

(a) To make contracts with and grants to, for periods not to exceed five years' duration, State agricultural experiment stations, colleges, universities, and other research institutions and organizations, and to private firms, associations, and individuals for research intended to carry out the purposes of this Act, including experimental commercialization of new crops, new or improved processes and products, and new uses for agricultural products.

(b) To grant exclusive licenses with or without payment of royalty for a fixed period of not to exceed five years for the use of patents under the control of the Department of Agriculture.

AMENDMENT TO RESEARCH AND MARKETING ACT OF 1946

SEC. 10. Title III of the Act entitled "An Act to provide for further research into basic laws and principles relating to agriculture and to improve and facilitate the marketing and distribution of agricultural products"; approved August 14, 1946, is amended as follows:

(1) By striking out section 301, and

(2) By deleting in section 302 the words "in addition to the National Advisory Committee" and the commas immediately preceding and following said words.

DEFINITION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

SEC. 11. The terms "agricultural products," "farm products," and "agricultural" or "farm commodities" as used in this Act shall have the same meaning as the term "agricultural products" in section 207 of the Act of August 14, 1946 (7 U.S.C. 1626).

SAVINGS PROVISION

SEC. 12. The authorities under this Act are in addition to and not in substitution for authorities otherwise available under existing law.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 13. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN] opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOEVEN. The gentleman from Iowa is in favor of the bill.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, we are all aware of the problems faced by the farmers of this country. We are all, I think, deeply and sincerely concerned with finding a means to solve the so-called farm problem. But that problem should be solved in a way that will enable the Nation's farmers to share equitably in the economic progress of our Nation, and at the same time, strengthen the economy and security of the Nation as a whole, including direct benefits to consumers themselves. This is not an easy problem. The House Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor of being a member, has struggled long and hard with this dilemma. A fully satisfactory answer is yet to be reached.

We have tried a good many ideas. Some of them have been helpful, some have been necessary for emergency situations, but none has created the substantial new markets which are essential.

We have tried acreage reductions, price supports, export subsidies, plowing under, and we have handed out Federal checks—soil bank checks—as compensation for doing nothing—all of these things and more in an earnest effort to solve the farm problem. Results have been no more than partly satisfying.

But there is one method, the most promising of all, that we have not tried, and that is to make agriculture an equal participant in the scientific revolution. Up to now, agriculture has not been able to go modern, except to a limited extent, in production.

Though I doubt it, some say we face the possibility of socialized farming. The farmer does not want it. The people do not want it. If that is what we are heading for, it is not the farmer's fault. It is the fault of government mainly, and of industry, both of which have failed to give the farmer a fair shake in the great scientific revolution that is now performing such wonders in our economy and way of living.

The farmer has participated substantially in one-half of this revolution—the half that has to do with production; but he has been denied the rich fruits of the other half that has to do with markets, utilization, cheaper production and new crops. He knows how to produce more than the markets will buy. The burdensome crop surpluses now in warehouses are ample evidence in support of that statement. Giving commodities away at home and abroad will not solve the surplus problem; neither will cutrate sales.

There are certain constructive, positive measures, however, which we can all be sure will benefit the farmer, the consumers, and the Nation as a whole. Research is the prime example. Research has had much to do with building our great industrial Nation. It has also given us the most efficient agriculture in the world. Just as research can do so much for industry—and industry steps up its research spending by almost a billion dollars each year—research can yet do wonders for agriculture. Using research to help work out our problems is the sound, constructive, American way to do business, to progress and to expand.

Unfortunately, agriculture has lagged far behind industry in the application of research. Especially in our federally supported research programs we see major attention given to other areas. Agriculture, which 20 years ago received about 40 cents of each Federal research dollar, now gets less than 3 cents. Of course, national defense, public health, space exploration and atomic powerplants are important. They all depend heavily on research. We would not want to see that research cut one cent. But agriculture is still one of our big problems, and we must do everything we can, everything that is possible, to insure that the future health and prosperity of American agriculture, and our country's strength in what its farms and ranches produce, does not wither and sicken the lack of research support.

Research may not solve the whole farm problem. I do not think it can. But it can do much to cut farm costs, improve income opportunities for farmers, to produce higher quality products for consumers, and to reduce surpluses by expanding present markets and creating new uses, particularly new industrial uses, for the products of farm, ranch and forest. What we do toward improving our agricultural research we can be sure is a move in the right direction for farmers, for consumers, and for the nation as a whole.

Industry has been invading the markets which naturally and historically belong to agriculture. Synthetic fibers have displaced cotton and wool; synthetic detergents have replaced fats and oils; and synthetic resins are now pushing natural oils out of the paint market.

How has industry done this? By research. Industry has studied the needs of the market and has set its scientists to figuring out means to produce things the people will buy.

Manufacturing industry invests about 2 percent of its gross sales in research. Some fast-growing lines, such as chemical and petroleum, invest up to 7 percent in research. But in agriculture the investment is only about one-half of 1 percent of total sales. No other important segment of the national economy is compelled to risk its present and its future on such limited efforts to expand and improve.

Farmers themselves cannot solve this problem. There are 5 million of them scattered from coast to coast, from Canada to Mexico, growing some 150 different crops. It is impossible for them to operate as a compact unit, building their own laboratories, carrying on their own research, studying the growing needs of industry for new raw materials, for improved qualities, for lower costs. Industries can perform these functions for themselves and are doing so at great profit. It is sensible and right that they should progress and prosper as they are. We will never protest that. But we do protest the fact that agriculture, our most essential activity, is not given the chance to participate as an equal in all-around scientific research, which now is a necessity for economic survival.

In 1956 Congress provided for the appointment by the President of a bipartisan Commission on Increased Industrial Use of Agricultural Products. That Commission has explored the entire field with great seriousness.

This Commission called to its assistance more than 180 leading men in American science and industry, specialists in agricultural materials and their uses. These experts, working in task groups appropriate to their specialties, suggested to the Commission more than 400 important proposals by which, through research, the markets for farm products can be expanded.

The Commission presented the Congress with a report which may well be a document historic in American agriculture. The report lists as illustrative examples only a few of the more than 400 proposals advanced by the task groups. Among them are ways by which research can substantially expand the markets for cotton, for soybeans, for corn, rice, wheat, and for almost every product of American soil.

Moreover, it has suggested definite approaches to the development of wholly new crops for which markets await or can be created. Most present crops, it points out, were in agriculture centuries ago, long before man had laboratories to examine plants for their chemical uses. Sufficiently profitable new crops can prevent surpluses, because they will naturally take over acres on which now we may be growing too much cotton or grain.

The Commission also pointed out that American farmers are now producing 4 or 5 percent more total output than the markets are consuming. It indicates that the momentum of technology is such that for several years ahead surpluses may be expected to increase rather than grow less.

The present markets, domestic and export, are not expected to expand that fast. Therefore, the necessity to create new markets, especially new industrial markets, is highly urgent.

The little research done in this field—and it is only a little—has been immensely profitable. I need to point not further than to the profits the citrus industry has gained from the process for concentrating and freezing citrus juices. That is, of course, a food use, but it came from research.

Congress is now providing only about $20 million for research in new uses and new crops—a little less than the cost for storing surpluses 3 weeks. The Commission urges that this outlay should at least be trebled.

The report points sharply to the great lag in basic research. It is filled with constructive suggestions and should be studied by everyone interested in sound solutions for agriculture.

There is one simple fact about industrial uses for farm products that I wish everyone understood. When a consumer buys enough for three good meals a day, that is all the food he wants. You cannot sell him any more. But hardly anyone ever acquires all the industrial products he wants. He can use radios in every room, one in his car, and one to carry around. He can use two or three TV sets. He can use two or three cars. He may even have two homes. The potential consumption of industrial products has no limit except buying power. We want to see farmers get a bigger chance at this great market for industrial goods.

Research appeals to me for many reasons. It is the modern way to improve existing products, to discover new products and new uses, and to lower costs. It is the affirmative way to tackle a difficult situation. Restrictions are negative, essential though they may be at this time. They are contrary to the experience of our American free enterprise system. They do not give the individual full use of his abilities and ambitions. In approaching the continuing problem of farm surpluses, let us think affirmatively, expansively, not restrictively. The American farmer shows an ever-increasing capacity and willingness to produce. It is up to us, through our government, educational institutions, and our industries, to find ways to use what he can grow, to lower costs, and to provide new crops and new uses.

What has happened to cotton and other natural fibers illustrates the need for scientific agricultural research. A few years ago the only fibers used were from natural sources, such as cotton, wool, hemp, and silk, but today about 45 percent of the fabrics market is taken over by synthetics. While this great change was taking place, all of it the result of scientific research, there was no comparable research going on in the interest of cotton. Vegetable oils suffered similar inroads in the manufacture of paints, leather was pushed out of more than half the shoe sole market, animal fats and oils lost heavily in the soap market to detergents made from petroleum, and so on. The chemical and petroleum people were busy in their laboratories, while farm products were left largely to get along without the kind of modern help that is essential.

No one knows exactly what the economic status of farmers would be today if, from the outset of the scientific revolution, they had been able to drive forward on equal terms with industry. We do know it would have been far better than it is now. The scientist rarely knows what he will find when he begins his work, but generally he finds something. He is the pioneer of today, exploring the unknown, and his frontier is an infinite distance ahead. The Commission, whose report I have mentioned, suggests seven new uses for cotton, every one of them a distinct possibility if adequately researched. This Commission also finds that new crops are needed, but here again the development of these crops must be preceded by research.

The time is here for action if we are to save the American farmer and the American economy from greater surpluses than we ever have known or from permanently restricted, controlled farming, under which the farmer cannot be a free American.

The President's Commission, after studying the whole farm problem, aided by numerous task groups composed of the ablest and best qualified business and scientific men, comes to the conclusion that the best hope for agriculture lies in research.

The House Committee on Agriculture as approved a research bill which is a constructive measure. The bill is H.R. 8639, coauthored by myself and the distinguished gentleman from Utah [Mr. DIXON]. The stated purpose of this bill is to increase the effectiveness of agricultural and forestry research in order to expand the markets for farm products, thereby benefiting consumers, increasing farm income, and strengthening the national economy.

In formulating this legislation our committee had the valuable counsel and assistance of the Nation's leading farm and commodity organizations, each of which supports the measure wholeheartedly. They are as follows: American Farm Bureau Federation, National Grange, National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, Beet Sugar Association, American Meat Institute, National Cotton Council, National Milk Producers Federation, Millers' National Federation, National Plant Food Institute.

A more adequate program of agricultural research depends on four basic factors: First, a sound balance of effort that brings research to bear wherever it is needed, on the most pressing problems or the most promising opportunities, at all times; second, imaginative program development and independent program appraisals to ensure effective research execution; third, coordinated and determined administration; and, fourth, adequate financing. We believe that the bill which the House Committee on Agriculture has reported will quickly bring about the first two of these needs—proper balance and independent program appraisal. It will strengthen research administration and lay a foundation for bigger, better overall effort in agricultural research.

How are these goals to be accomplished? In addition to the statement of declarations and finding of the Congress, the bill has two major features. The most important is the creation of an independent commission to appraise agriculture's research needs and opportunities and make recommendations thereon. The second consists of the additional authorities given the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct research more efficiently. These deal with contracts and grants and with new licensing provisions with regard to patents.

Our bill would establish an Agricultural Research and Development Commission as an independent agency in the executive branch of Government. The Commission would consist of seven members appointed by the President and subject to Senate confirmation. The Commission would be responsible for reviewing not only the total agricultural research effort, but also the research programs of individual commodities. The Commission's appraisal would be for the purpose of determining the effectiveness of present research programs to meet existing problems and to achieve agriculture's fullest research potential. The Commission is also authorized to recommend, as it sees fit, the initiation, expansion, redirection, or termination of areas of agricultural research. It would be convened not less than four times a year, and report its findings and recommendations not later than each June 30, to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Congress.

The Commission is directed in its studies and reports to emphasize means to increase the industrial utilization of farm products. It would give special attention to major problem areas of agriculture research, cost reduction and quality improvement possibilities, and marketing and merchandising problems of farm commodities. The Commission would also recommend the nature and extent of research that can be most effectively conducted in foreign countries with foreign currencies available to the United States.

In its reports the Commission shall make recommendations as to the proper balance in research efforts on both overall agricultural and commodity problems. This will include the emphasis needed in production, utilization, marketing, and home economics research as well as the balance between applied and basic research.

The Commission is also charged with the responsibility of reviewing the research structure of the Department of Agriculture and recommending to the Secretary changes in organizational structure to strengthen the research program of the Department.

An Executive Director of the Commission would be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture from persons nominated by members of the Commission.

The Commission is specifically directed not to engage in or administer any type of research. The reason should be obvious. Research cannot be effective as a two-headed monster. Our subcommittee considered several bills which would have set up new research agencies, either inside or outside the Department of Agriculture, to sponsor or conduct agricultural research. The subcommittee rejected these approaches, recognizing the damage and waste that would inevitably result from overlapping, duplicating research programs.

At this point it might be worth while to note some of the things which the House bill does not do. It does not, as I have just noted, create a two-headed, wasteful research administration. It does not unbalance the agricultural research effort. It does not put the Government in business, as some bills proposed. It does not divert research from rising farm costs. And it does not contain hidden subsidy provisions.

Turning to the other principal features of the bill, the additional authorities granted the Secretary of Agriculture for the conduct of research are as follows: First, the authority to make contracts with and grants to public and private agencies for the conduct of research to achieve the purpose of the bill, including experimental commercialization of new crops and new uses for agricultural products; and, second, the authority to grant exclusive licenses, with or without royalty payments, for periods not in excess of 5 years for the use of patents under the control of the Department of Agriculture.

Why are these two new authorities needed? They are aimed at increasing the effectiveness of the federally supported research programs.

Let us consider the new contract and grant authority first. Research, by its nature, is difficult to contract. It is frequently impossible for a contractor to guarantee a tangible product. Contractual terms, therefore, necessarily deal with effort to be expended which is difficult to measure. Many private organizations are skeptical of research contract terms which are too exacting and are reluctant to sign a research contract with the Government.

Grants to responsible research organizations offer more flexibility and a wider range of agencies would be willing to undertake research for the Government.

The second authority deals with exclusive licenses. The Department of Agriculture obtains public patents for all patentable research findings financed by appropriations for USDA research. These may be used by any private individual or company. The fact that at any time another company may begin using such a public patent deters many organizations from spending the money to develop and promote that product. An exclusive license, granted to a company for a 5-year period, would offer the necessary incentive to that company to carry out the necessary development work and promotion and to have a chance to recover its investment before competition moves in. This provision is vitally important to commercializing many federally developed processes.

Moving now to the Commission, let us examine the purposes for which it is established. One of its major functions is to provide an independent program appraisal of research activities conducted by the Department of Agriculture. There is no question but that the lack of such an independent review is a serious shortcoming of our agricultural research programs.

Research is a highly complex, technical field. Proper guidance of research activities of any organization, whether public or private, requires highly qualified management experienced in the particular service.

The best way, perhaps, to approach the problem is to look at the way private industry operates its research program. In almost every individual firm, a single individual is responsible for the administration of that firm's research operations.

Generally speaking, however, this man does not make the basic managerial decisions as to the amount invested in research, the initiation or termination of research areas, or the emphasis given to various fields of research. This function is performed by some authority over research administration, such as a board of directors or executive committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are good and valid reasons for this separation of responsibilities. The administration of a research program—the responsibility for its success or failure—is in itself a full-time job. An individual responsible for the conduct of a research program simply does not have, nor can he have, an independent viewpoint in regard to the programs which he administers. It takes an individual or group divorced from the responsibility of supervising the day-to-day operation of the research program to perform this vital function.

The Commission which this bill proposes would provide the answer. Because of its separation from the Department of Agriculture, it would give the competent, independent review of agriculture's research needs and opportunities so vitally needed. It should be added at this point that the Commission does not, in the performance of this function, usurp any of the Department's prerogatives. It merely recommends. But it makes its recommendations both to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Congress, so that the Congress can work with the Department to bring about the kind of research program that agriculture needs and must have.

The achievement of proper balance in agricultural research is another extremely important function of the Commission. What is proper balance in agricultural research? We think it can be said at the outset that there can never be any one formula for determining just how the total research effort should be divided for all of agriculture at any one time. If we want an effective, productive agricultural research effort no one field of research can receive all the emphasis, attention, and funds, while other critical problems remain untouched for want of an adequate research budget.

Balance in agricultural research can only be achieved when we fit research to the needs, the problems, and the potential of individual commodities and of particular situations of agriculture, at any given time.

Mr. Speaker, the Research and Extension Subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture, of which it is my honor to serve as chairman, held extensive hearings on agriculture's research needs. We received testimony from many, many interested groups. Our deliberations in executive session were painstaking. The bill which resulted from these sessions, and which has been reported by the Committee on Agriculture, is supported by the major national farm and commodity organizations. It is our firm conviction that this is vital and necessary legislation. We are most hopeful that the House will receive it favorably.

Farmers need this job done now. Let us get it underway.

I wish to pay tribute to the members of my subcommittee, all of whom have worked long and hard in formulating this legislation. Joining me in the introduction of the various bills were the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JENNINGS], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. DIXON], the gentlewoman from Washington [Mrs. MAY], the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCINTIRE], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BROCK], the gentleman from California [Mr. SAUND], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEED], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN], the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. SCHWENGEL], and others. Their cooperation has been wonderful and their assistance has been immeasurable.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I feel impelled at this time to make a few remarks about our very esteemed chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY], and to ask a couple of questions for clarification. He has worked for 3 years on one of the most difficult problems that we have ever had. He has done what I thought would be the impossible. That is, he united at least 22 of the major farm organizations and commodity groups on one bill. I think it includes every one of them, as far as I know. They have come to a unity on the bill. It is the finest and most skilled statesmanship I have seen in a long, long time. I predict it will not be more than 2 or 3 years before people generally throughout the United States will point to this legislation—the Abernethy bill—as the most outstanding contribution to agriculture passed by the 86th Congress.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Of course, I appreciate the very generous remarks of the gentleman. The gentleman himself made a very material contribution to this effort. He worked hard throughout all of these years, and joined in the introduction of the bill now before the House.

Mr. DIXON. There are two questions I wish to ask. On page 10 of the bill the Secretary is granted power "to grant exclusive licenses with or without payment of royalty for a fixed period of not to exceed 5 years for the use of patents under the control of the Department of Agriculture."

Now, as I understand, he has not the power to issue exclusive licenses at the present time.

Mr. ABERNETHY. That is correct.

Mr. DIXON. Why is it advisable to give him power to issue exclusive licenses.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Well, the reason for that is this: When, through research, the Department of Agriculture develops a particular process which it thinks will be good in moving a particular item on the market, if it contracts now with a business institution to develop that process, the institution has no protection because the Secretary has no authority to grant an exclusive license. Once the institution begins to prove that the process will be a success, then other concerns move in and the original institution loses the benefit of the investment made in proving the market acceptability of the process. Therefore, these business institutions hesitate to experiment with these matters which the Secretary of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture might desire to contract to them. So, this bill gives the Secretary the authority to grant exclusive licenses by contract not to exceed 5 years with a particular institution or group of institutions.

Mr. DIXON. That clears up that point. Now, the second point. The Secretary is given the right to contract for experimental commercialization of any of these findings of its research. That does not mean that he can go into the manufacturing business.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Oh, no. It does not permit the Department of Agriculture to go into business in competition with anyone.

Mr. DIXON. He makes a contract for that commercialized experimentation.

Mr. ABERNETHY. That is correct.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to commend the distinguished gentleman and his subcommittee on the work they have done in bringing this bill to the floor. May I ask the gentleman whether in the study of this matter his subcommittee gave consideration to the need for additional facilities at experimental stations?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes; we did. In fact, we gave considerable study to it. We had the assistance and the advice of Dr. Louis Hawkins who, I believe, is the director of the Agriculture Experiment Station at Oklahoma State University, in the gentleman's own State, and also of Dr. Myers, who serves in a similar capacity in the State of Arizona, as well as others in that field.

Now, we looked with considerable favor upon their recommendations, however we did not feel that we should include that in the bill at this time. It was a high cost item. We felt that inasmuch as this bill was more or less a nominal cost item we did not want to encumber it with an item which would carry with it an authorization for large sums of money. Now, it was our intention to include in the report accompanying this bill a statement regarding the matter. In fact, the statement was prepared, and it was inadvertently omitted. I think I should read it into the record of this debate, and I shall do so at this time. It is as follows:

> The committee heard testimony on several proposals, one of which concerned research into enlarged utilization of products of the farm and forest; and also would authorize appropriation of Federal-grant funds on a matching basis to help finance laboratories and other physical facilities for the conduct of basic and applied research in the State agricultural experiment stations. The committee believes this latter subject should stand separately and be justified on its own merits, with appropriate reference to the existing authorization for Federal-grant support of research at the State agricultural experiment stations.

I would like to say to the gentleman that we plan to renew hearings on this subject next year. I wish to assure him and other interested parties that we will thoroughly and sympathetically consider the proposal. I think it has merit, and I think we should do something about it.

Mr. ALBERT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, the total 1960 allotment for research for new and industrial uses of farm crops is $16 million. It has stood at practically the same figure for the past several years, except for a new provision which permits the use of $8 million this year in foreign currencies for research abroad with an additional $12 million for 1960.

This lack of emphasis upon utilization research is difficult for me to understand in the light of its accomplishments.

Utilization research liquidates its cost many times over every single year. We have utilization research laboratories at Philadelphia; Peoria, Ill.; New Orleans; and Albany, Calif. They and their substations received all of the $16 million.

Now to cite just a few examples of the achievements of USDA through cooperation with other agencies:

First. The Southern Laboratory in conjunction with the Florida Citrus Commission developed frozen orange juice concentrate. Last year alone this product returned $180 million with a net return to growers of $121 million, and is given credit for saving the citrus fruit industry in Florida. This saving alone is more money than the Government has spent on the four laboratories in the last 15 years.

Second. While penicillin was discovered by Fleming in England, the British did not know how to manufacture it in quantity at reasonable cost. Scientists at the Northern Laboratory found a higher producing organism from a half spoiled cantaloup. Now, as far as we know, all the penicillin is made from the progeny of this organism. The Northern USDA Laboratory succeeded in reducing the cost from $20 to 60 cents per 100,000 units. In the period 1943 to 1957 the 5 million pounds produced sold for $748 million. This alone amounts to more money than we have given the laboratories in their history and will give them in many future generations.

Third. Industry spends an average of $2 out of every $100 received for research. The comparable figure for farm research is only 50 cents and the larger share of that is spent on production—not utilization or marketing research.

Fourth. Ten to fifteen years ago soybean oil was a rather small item because of its instability and its tendency to develop off flavors. The Northern Laboratory in conjunction with industry eliminated the small traces of copper and iron and through this research soybean oil is now the principal food oil in the United States. The annual market value is $200 million.

Fifth. Synthetic detergents—largely petroleum based—as a result of research in the oil industry, took from the farmers half of their market for animal fats. Our Eastern Laboratory has now developed animal fat based plasticizers and animal fat based detergents as well as livestock feed which now consume, at approximately 6 cents a pound, 600 million pounds of animal fats. The time is not far off when greater research and more factories will consume far more than this amount and be able to pay livestock people as much as 10 cents a pound instead of the 2 to 3 cents a pound which would have been the market without these research developments.

The results of research of the experiment station at the Utah State University pays to the State of Utah in actual cost and savings more money each year than the State and Federal Governments have spent on the Department in its entire history.

WHY DO WE NEED A COMMISSION TO STIMULATE RESEARCH FOR NEW AND INCREASED INDUSTRIAL USES OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS?

Mr. Speaker, for 5 years I have looked forward to this day when the House would pass a bill to support and speed up research for new and additional uses of farm crops in industry. The Commission to be set up under authority of H.R. 8639 can become so effective that our utilization research program will constitute one of the major solutions to the farm surplus problem.

The present administration and the 84th Congress were so convinced that stepped-up research would result in the industrial consumption of far more of our farm crops that the 84th Congress passed Public Law 540. This law resulted in the President appointing a Commission to recommend legislation providing for increased industrial uses of agricultural products. In its report of April 17, 1957, the President's Commission pointed out that research holds fascinating and unbelievable promise. It went so far as to recommend immediate passage of legislation to stimulate utilization research and the annual appropriation of $50 million as a bare minimum.

Your subcommittee has, under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY] held extensive hearings in which the witnesses were unanimous in supporting utilization research legislation and in maintaining that utilization research is one permanent solution to the farm problem.

As a result of these hearings, your Committee on Agriculture recommends the establishment of a commission to speed up utilization research. The reasons as I see them are as follows:

First. During the three war periods when food was in such demand, marketing and utilization research were greatly curtailed in favor of an all-out effort for production research. This stop-and-start procedure has been extremely damaging to utilization and marketing research.

Second. Funds provided for research have been spread so thin that maximum results were impossible.

Third. Our farmers are definitely production minded and exert great pressure on the Department for production research while the pressure for utilization research is now just beginning to make itself universally felt. As a result of the greater demand for production research more scientists have been trained in that field and are consequently to a considerable extent production minded.

Fourth. Twenty-two great farm commodity groups such as the American Farm Bureau, the National Grange, the National Council of Farm Cooperatives, National Milk Producers Federation, National Cotton Council and many others appear to share with the members of the committee the feeling of urgency in this movement. It was also the general feeling that without a commission assigned to the specific responsibility of promoting more effective research programs designed to expand markets and reduce surpluses such a program would not get off the ground fast enough to help meet our critical farm needs. Therefore they support unanimously H.R. 8639.

Personally I do not think that H.R. 8639 goes far enough. It should carry an adequate appropriation and also provide money to construct building and research facilities at the land grant colleges in the various States where the lack of buildings and research facilities now present such a formidable barrier to progress. The bills that I have introduced over the last 3 years have contained a specific authorization for an appropriation and the bill I submitted last year provided for research building and facilities. I do feel though that the building and facilities provision is necessary and that the next Congress should by all means pass such legislation.

Fifth. The Commission is necessary because it would be independent. It has the power to nominate persons for Executive Director of Research and Development. This Director shall serve at the pleasure of the Commission. Furthermore it is required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Congress. By keeping in close communication with the Commission and helping to provide money, the Committee on Agriculture and the Congress can work its will in the promotion of utilization and marketing research. The USDA has made marvelous progress in utilization research in spite of the handicaps I have mentioned above. In fact, if it were not for the remarkable progress the USDA has made, the President's Commission would not have come out so boldly in support of a rapidly stepped-up program.

Sixth. Interesting illustrations of USDA progress in utilization research include water hoses and attractive-looking raincoats made out of animal fats, fluorescent coats for nightwear, flame resistant materials not affected by drycleaning, nonshrinkable wool, fish net undershirts, wool which looks like cotton and cotton which looks like wool, spindly plants which through "intermarriage" have been transformed into large healthy flowers, and peanut butter oil which will not separate.

Let me illustrate further in greater detail some achievements of utilization research in various commodities. Utilization research is responsible for the markets that cotton now enjoys. Faced with formidable competition from synthetic fibers, the cotton industry moved to machine harvesting and drying at the gin. These processes, designed to reduce cost and thus help cotton compete with synthetics, introduced foreign materials and brought about changes in the cotton fiber, thus placing markets for these products in further jeopardy. Utilization research solved the problem of efficient, low-cost cleaning of machine-harvested cotton and of avoiding quality damage at the gin. More recently, utilization research has developed the wash-and-wear cotton fabrics now on the market. These are so much superior to synthetics or blends that consumers are turning more and more to all cotton in the wash-and-wear field. These developments have literally saved the cotton industry.

Utilization research began at about the same time. Utilization research solved the problems that permitted soybean oil to become the primary food oil, and soybean meal the primary protein feedstuff in the United States. It developed industrial chemicals from soybean oil that now form the basis of paints and other formulations that are providing outlets for millions of bushels of soybeans annually. The soybean industry has grown rapidly but only as rapidly as research has permitted it. There is no better example of the value of research in agriculture today.

Inedible animal fats—tallows and greases—formerly used by the millions of pounds to produce soap, were thrown out of this market almost overnight by public acceptance of synthetic detergents. Utilization research has provided alternative markets for these fats that have converted this situation from one of crisis to the livestock industry to one where animal fats now enjoy substantial acceptance on the domestic market. Utilization research has already provided markets for 600 million pounds of animal fats annually in plastics and in animal feed. Current research is adding regularly to the annual demand for animal fats as industrial raw materials.

Cottonseed meal, for decades used almost entirely as a cattle feed, is now being used extensively in mixed feeds for poultry and swine. Utilization research, spearheading a vast cooperative program with Federal, State and commercial groups, discovered the causes of toxicity of cottonseed meal for poultry and swine and prescribed means for overcoming them. This achievement removed the handicap that prevented cottonseed meal from sharing fully in the tremendous mixed feed market. As a result, more than 1¼ million tons of cottonseed meal, having a value of $50 million, were used in broiler and swine rations up to January 1958, and the rate of use now exceeds one-fourth million tons annually.

Dehydrated foods were essential in feeding our Armed Forces overseas during wartime. Utilization research solved many of the problems associated with production of nutritious, palatable, stable, dried foods for the Quartermaster Corps. Noteworthy in this respect was solution of the problem of storage stability of dried eggs. The research was not only successful in solving the problem for the military but it has placed dried eggs on the pantry shelf in the form of stable, egg-containing prepared cake and pastry mixes. More than 25 million pounds of dried eggs are used annually for this purpose and their use is expanding rapidly.

Many other significant accomplishments of utilization research can be mentioned.

The 50-million-pound annual market for animal fats as emulsifiers for the production of synthetic rubber was saved.

Wartime research on cereals made important contributions to the alcohol-from-wheat program which utilized 258 million bushels, and to wheat wet milling which produced starch and sirup from 3 million bushels.

Our penicillin process, growing steadily in application from the beginning, has required steep liquor from 15 million bushels of corn, and the dextran process has required 3 million pounds of sugar.

Soft grit blasting has utilized 5 million tons of corn cobs. Pulp and paper have consumed 7 million tons of straw.

The value of dehydrated fruits and vegetables to which we made substantial contributions, rose to $140 million per year during the war. While it subsided immediately afterward, there is a flourishing industry today whose product is worth $8 million annually and is increasing steadily. A substantial part of this production is exported.

Our new belt-trough dryer should save the fruit and vegetable dehydration industry $500,000 annually.

The dehydrated mashed potato industry, to which our research has contributed greatly, paid $4 million to growers in 1957 and will grow steadily. Our new potato flakes will increase this outlet substantially.

Research on frozen poultry has made it possible to realize the important economies of high temperature scalding and has brought under control the post mortem development of toughness. Annual worth to the industry is estimated at $8 million.

As a result of Department research, 85,000 tons of feathers per year are processed into meal selling at $90 per ton for feed.

These are but a few examples taken from the list of 150 developments, illustrating the effect of Department research on the utilization of farm commodities. And these 150, representing as they do developments that are now in commercial use, do not include many that may soon become commerical realities, nor do they reflect fully the vast intangible benefits that utilization research findings have brought to those who produce, process and consume our Nation's crops. Each is making a significant contribution to improved agriculture. Each year sees major additions to the list.

We are confident that an expanded program will accelerate the development of additional new and expanded uses, and thus more rapidly achieve the objective of full, profitable utilization of our agricultural output.

Many of the utilization research discoveries need further help to become commercial. H.R. 8639 will speed the process of getting research achievements into actual production by, first, setting up the seven-member Agricultural Research and Development Commission to help follow through with commercialization of research discoveries; second, granting the Secretary of Agriculture authority to make contracts for experimental commercialization; third, giving the Secretary authority to grant exclusive licenses to a company or a group of companies acting jointly; fourth, encouraging more appropriations for this activity.

Seventh. Utilization research liquidates its cost. These few examples that I have cited are sufficient to prove: First, that such research more than liquidates its cost; second, that it is not an expenditure but a most profitable investment for the Federal Government, because one or two discoveries alone produce more wealth each year than the annual $3 to $16 million which the Government has invested in utilization research over the past 18 years since the four laboratories were established; third, that there are scores of equally promising undeveloped or partially developed research projects awaiting the touch of the scientist's hand to spring into full fruition; and fourth, that it has the power to reduce price depressing agricultural surpluses by increasing the demand and, therefore, by bringing supply and demand more into balance. These results will not spring forth overnight, but they will come, nevertheless, if only given more encouragement.

Eighth. What can we expect as a result of stepped-up utilization research? The following are just a few dramatic examples of the new uses and new crops which will probably be developed.

WHOLE MILK POWDER

Think of the saving in cost, refrigeration, bottling, and marketing of whole milk that would result from a whole milk powder producing milk just as palatable and nutritious as milk itself. We are almost assured of such a product within the next few years.

CORN

If we could increase from 80 percent to 100 percent the amylose starch produced by corn it could provide a use for up to 200 million bushels of grain. This starch is particularly promising for edible packaging of food products, plastics, transparent films, sizing, coating, and adhesive materials for paper and paper products.

EXPANDED USE OF ANIMAL FATS

Dr. Waldo Ault at the Philadelphia Laboratory said to me:

The use of detergents instead of soap, plastics instead of leather and vegetable oils instead of lard (all the results of research) has almost put the livestock man out of the byproducts business. I am confident that research will put him back in. We cannot afford not to do research.

In 1947 the soap industry alone used 1.5 billion pounds, or 71 percent, of our animal fats. Recent figures are only 812,720,000 pounds or 27 percent of total inedible fats. This is all due to the development of competitive detergents by industry. Synthetic detergents put animal fats on the skids. Most detergents have a petroleum base of 20 to 30 percent. Dr. Ault told me there are some disadvantages to petroleum-based detergents. Soap is better in soft waters but poor in hard waters. Soap can be produced in bar form. Petroleum-based detergents cannot. Detergents are less effective in keeping soil suspended in the water.

The USDA has research underway designed to make an animal-fat-based detergent that will compete successfully with petroleum-based detergents. The USDA has also developed oils from animal fats which oils will compete successfully with petroleum oils as additives. Their product is fully as good as the commercial oils and better for some purposes. To illustrate—as the parts of machinery get smaller and smaller and the pressure greater and greater, oil plays an important role. Commercial oils break down under 1,700 pounds pressure, while the oils being developed from animal fats in the Philadelphia Laboratory stand up under 2,000 pounds pressure. This development has significant possibilities and could have a positive influence on livestock prices and markets. Its potential could reach 300 million pounds or 10 percent of the production of animal fats.

In addition to uses in detergents and oils, fats have an increasing outlet in plastics. Plastics are tending to put leather out of business and research on animal and plant fat-based plastics could replace the losses to farmers from low-priced hides. A number of the larger plastic manufacturers are using more and more fats in the manufacture of plastics. You will be interested to note that the new soft pliable plastic lawn hose is a rather recent result of research in the use of fats to give the softness and pliability to plastics. The same is true of plastic seat covers and Armstrong's vinyl floor tile.

The discovery and use of antioxidents to prevent melted fats from becoming rancid has opened up the fertile field of fats in mixed livestock and poultry feeds.

It is entirely possible that our farmers can increase their income through the production of completely new commercial crops even more than through increased uses of existing crops. Many new crops are almost ready. More than a dozen others show considerable promise and hundreds of others are in the early testing stages. Plants which have been grown successfully in other parts of the world are being tested to see if they can be adapted for commercial production in parts of the United States.

Soybeans, for example, the Korean Lespedeza, were developed this way. Of more than 250,000 plants grown in the world only 150 are grown commercially in the United States and only 80 have markets exceeding a million dollars a year. The following are illustrations:

BAMBOO

As many as 50 million acres, twice the current acreage of soybeans, might be grown for industrial uses. Bamboo is roughly four times as productive as well-managed Southern pine as a source of cellulose for the manufacturer of high quality paper and much more profitable. It is also a valuable structural material for furniture and special products. All of our bamboo, however, is imported at present. Acres of bamboo could replace acres now in cotton, peanuts, and dryland rice in the southeast. It is believed that through research in production methods, utilization and marketing the remaining obstacles can soon be overcome.

CASTOR BEANS

Likely the most profitable new crop in the offing is castor beans. Acreage might ultimately expand from 75,000 acres to more than one million acres. At present 90 percent of the United States' needs are imported. Oil from castor beans has unique qualities for use in paints, varnishes, fungicides and cosmetics. Until disease problems are beaten, production is likely to be confined to the southwest. The high cost of harvesting machinery is the main obstacle to expanded production at present. However, the USDA as well as industry engineers are working to trim these costs now.

SAFFLOWER

Safflower is a dry-climate thistle producing oil used in varnishes, enamels and high quality paints. The meal is a good source of protein for livestock. It can be a replacement for wheat in high plains areas and in the winter in some cotton sections of California and Arizona. Continued research, however, is needed in breeding high-yielding and early maturing varieties and on new uses for the oil.

SESAME

Some researchers believe that sesame may become an industrial crop for the South nearly as important as soybeans are to the North, although this may be some time off. Sesame was first grown in 1950, and approximately 25,000 acres are now grown. Under favorable conditions sesame can produce more oil per acre than any other edible seed crop.

CANAIGRE

The winter-warm valleys of the Southwestern States may sometime produce canaigre roots as a commercial source of tannin. The leather industry now imports 75 percent of its tannin.

Other potential new crops include jojoba, for the production of oil and wax; candelilla, another promising source of vegetable wax with 34 uses already known; and kenaf, to produce a fiber useful in the manufacture of burlap, twine, carpet yarn and paper pulp.

In conclusion the cost of utilization research is small and the benefits are enormous. We might already be producing many of these new crops, and we might already have expanded uses for our farm crops had we been dedicating greater financial resources to utilization research. For every hundred dollars of farm income we spend 50 cents for research—a small fraction of the $3 per hundred spent by industry on its research. Only 4½ cents of this 50 cents has gone to marketing and utilization research. The cost has been negligible, yet the results are already admirable.

When you think of the billions of dollars which have been lost in unsuccessful price support programs, it highlights the need to expand the small appropriation given for utilization research which will help cure the farm problem rather than be like an aspirin and merely deaden the pain.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. McINTIRE].

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, may I, with relation to H.R. 8639, extend my warmest congratulations to the gentleman from Misissippi [Mr. ABERNETHY], chairman of the Subcommittee on Research and Extension, a subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture.

All members of the subcommittee have worked diligently to bring before the House a bill that deals constructively with this vitally important field of agricultural research, and there has been required many months of work in resolving diverse interests.

Extensive hearings have been held and long hours spent in trying to bring research objectives into focus, in developing the proper language that would build constructively on existing research capabilities and still provide a vehicle for proper analysis and direction in this area so vital to the future of American agriculture.

I would call to your attention the fact that in the 85th Congress 21 bills were introduced dealing with this subject, and in the 86th Congress 16 bills, including H.R. 2720, my own legislative recommendation in this field, have been introduced.

It is my feeling that this legislation does not in any manner serve as a criticism of the work of USDA scientists in the research field, and it can, in fact, result in material assistance to those in charge of agricultural research by providing a constructive orientation.

There is a great need for research that will open new markets and new uses for the products of our farms. Such research can result in greater service to consumers and improved opportunities for the producer. In fact, I believe that all elements of our economy will prove the beneficiaries of the objective involved in this legislation.

Through research and its application in production, processing, and distribution, the American farmer has performed miracles in supplying an abundance of the finest foods the world has ever known, and the costs in hours of labor are the lowest that mankind has ever enjoyed.

Although this bill promises to open new doors of opportunity for both the consumer and the farmer, it will not solve all problems. Research is not an overnight answer to the farmer's problem of lack of bargaining power, but in being a sound approach to the full utilization of our agricultural resources, it will assist materially in meeting the challenging problems as related to the needs of an expanding economy.

In closing may I pay a tribute to those in agricultural research. They have brought us a multitude of blessings against the background of many problems. We hope this legislation will prove of constructive service in a more comprehensive utilization of the capabilities of agricultural research in the future.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Alan Rains, executive vice president of United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, wrote me under date of August 28, 1959, that his organization supports this legislation.

Under date of August 31, 1959, Mr. Homer Brinkley, executive vice president of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, has also indicated the support of that organization to the principles of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that the House suspend the rules and pass H.R. 8639.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Washington [Mrs. MAY] for a unanimous-consent request.

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I represent a district in the State of Washington where the wheatgrowers have long supported a program of more emphasis on the utilization aspect of agricultural research. Because we are one of the largest traditional wheatgrowing areas of the Nation, we share the country's concern over how best to handle our ever-mounting surplus stocks, which so seriously threaten the economic future of our wheatgrowers. It has long been the consensus of opinion among us that it is a strange paradox that the great production record which American agriculture has achieved should today be a matter of regret rather than a cause for rejoicing. Therefore, a practical program of planning and action by the Department of Agriculture for utilizing this surplus would seem to present one of the most sound and sensitive approaches to solution. This is why I am giving my complete support to the bill before us, and join my colleagues in commending the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi who has performed such an able and difficult job as the chairman of our Subcommittee on Research in getting the legislation before Congress.

Several members of our committee have already commented on the need for and the purpose of this legislation, and I should like to direct my remarks at this point to what has already been accomplished in the field of utilization research by the Department of Agriculture. I believe this record of past achievement will emphasize the great potential—what yet might be accomplished in this field through major breakthroughs in research projects already underway.

The record of achievement of utilization research in the Department of Agriculture is long and impressive. This can be illustrated most dramatically by the accomplishments of utilization research for several of our major commodities.

Utilization research is responsible for the markets that cotton now enjoys. Faced with formidable competition from synthetic fibers, the cotton industry moved to machine harvesting and drying at the gin. These processes, designed to reduce cost and thus help cotton compete with synthetics, introduced foreign materials and brought about changes in the cotton fiber, thus placing markets for these products in further jeopardy. Utilization research solved the problem of efficient, low-cost cleaning of machine-harvested cotton and of avoiding quality damage at the gin. More recently, utilization research has developed the wash-and-wear cotton fabrics now on the market. These are so much superior to synthetics or blends that consumers are turning more and more to all cotton in the wash-and-wear fields. These developments have literally saved the cotton industry.

Utilization research has made possible the development of the soybean as a food and industrial crop in the United States. Extensive soybean farming and utilization research began at about the same time. Utilization research solved the problem that permitted soybean oil to become the primary food oil, and soybean meal the primary protein feedstuff in the United States. It developed industrial chemicals from soybean oil that now form the basis of paints and other formulations that are providing outlets for millions of bushels of soybeans annually. The soybean industry has grown rapidly but only as rapidly as research has permitted it. There is no better example of the value of research in agriculture today.

Inedible animal fats—tallows and greases—formerly used by the millions of pounds to produce soap, were thrown out of this market almost overnight by public acceptance of synthetic detergents. Utilization research has provided alternative markets for these fats that have converted this situation from one of crisis to the livestock industry to one where animal fats now enjoy substantial acceptance on the domestic market. Utilization research has already provided markets for 380 million pounds of animal fats annually in plastics and in animal feed. Current research is adding regularly to the annual demand for animal fats as industrial raw materials.

Utilization research, in cooperation with the Florida Citrus Commission, developed frozen, concentrated orange juice, a product that may well have been the salvation of the Florida citrus industry. As a result of this research, larger crops can now be processed and marketed efficiently to provide the consumer with a stable, high quality product in all seasons. Frozen concentrated orange juice has absorbed over 350 million boxes of fruit worth over a billion dollars to growers.

Cottonseed meal, for decades used almost entirely as a cattle feed, is now being used extensively in mixed feeds for poultry and swine. Utilization research, spearheading a vast cooperative program with Federal, State, and commercial groups, discovered the causes of toxicity of cottonseed meal for poultry and swine and prescribed means for overcoming them. As a result, more than 1¼ million tons of cottonseed meal, having a value of $50 million, were used in broiler and swine rations up to January 1958, and the rate of use now exceeds one-fourth million tons annually.

Dehydrated foods were essential in feeding our armed forces overseas during wartime. Utilization research solved many of the problems associated with production of nutritious, platable stable dried foods for the Quartermaster Corps. Noteworthy in this respect was solution of the problem of storage stability of dried egg. The research was not only successful in solving the problem for the military but it has placed dried egg on the pantry shelf in the form of stable, egg-containing prepared cake and pastry mixes. More than 25 million pounds of dried egg are used annually for this purpose and their use is expanding rapidly.

The 50-million-pound annual market for animal fats as emulsifiers for the production of synthetic rubber was saved.

Wartime research on cereals made important contributions to the alcohol-from-wheat program which utilized 258 million bushels, and to wheat wet-milling which produced starch and syrup from 3 million bushels.

Our new belt-trough dryer should save the fruit and vegetable dehydration industry $500,000 annually.

The dehydrated-mashed-potato industry, to which our research has contributed greatly, paid $4 million to growers in 1957 and will grow steadily. Our new potato flakes will increase this outlet substantially.

Research on frozen poultry has made it possible to realize the important economies of high-temperature scalding and has brought under control the post mortem development of toughness. Annual worth to the industry is estimated at $8 million.

As a result of Department of Agriculture research, 85,000 tons of feathers per year are processed into meal selling at $90 per ton for feed.

These are but a few examples, taken from the list of 150 developments attached, illustrating the effect of Department research on the utilization of farm commodities. And these 150, representing as they do developments that are now in commercial use, do not include many that may soon become commercial realities, nor do they reflect fully the vast intangible benefits that utilization research findings have brought to those who produce, process and consume our Nation's crops. Each is making a significant contribution to improved agriculture. Each year sees major additions to the list.

I am confident that an expanded program as proposed under this bill will accelerate the development of additional new and expanded uses, and thus more rapidly achieve the objective of full, profitable utilization of our agricultural output.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN].

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. DIXON], as well as all members of the Subcommittee on Research and Development, for the diligent effort they have put forth in presenting a constructive and workable bill to the House. We all know the great problems confronting our agricultural economy today in trying to get rid of surplus agricultural commodities. We have devoted too little time in research in getting that job done.

The purpose of the bill is to stimulate and guide more adequate and effective agricultural research into new uses for agricultural products. There has been a growing conviction among Members of Congress and others interested in agriculture that if agriculture is to go forward, the field of research, the program must be substantially stepped up in order to keep pace with the research being devoted to development in other fields.

H.R. 8639 has been carefully worked out after long hearings. It is compromise legislation worked out with the Department of Agriculture, the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau, the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, the National Milk Producers Federation, the National Cotton Council, the National Plant Food Institute, the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, the American Meat Institute, the Millers National Federation, and the U.S. Beet Sugar Association.

A strong program of research is essential to maintain this Nation's agriculture in a position of world leadership. The solvency of this important segment of the Nation's economy and the quality of our food and fiber in the future depend upon imaginative planning and sound management of our research program.

H.R. 8639 would create an independent Agricultural Research and Development Commission appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. This Commission would have the duty to appraise agriculture's research needs, opportunities, and accomplishments, and to furnish authoritative recommendations to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Congress designed to meet the future needs of agriculture. The effectiveness of current research programs would be evaluated, with guidance for the most effective programs of research into new uses for agricultural products, the development of new crops, and the improvement of basic crop and livestock practices, marketing, forestry and home economics.

The Commission would have a competent small staff headed by an executive director. In addition, it would have the services of specialists in many fields and would consult freely with the experts in the Department of Agriculture, meet with the commodity research advisory committees of the Department, and seek advice from the general farm organizations, commodity organizations, industry associations, scientific societies, and many others who may be in a position to contribute to this important work.

The bill gives the Secretary of Agriculture authority to make contracts and grants to State agricultural experiment stations, colleges, universities, and other research institutions, and also to private firms and individuals for special research to carry out the purposes of the act. There is provision for the extension of this authority to include experimental commercialization of new crops and of new or improved processes and new uses for agricultural products.

The Secretary also would be authorized to grant exclusive licenses for a period not to exceed 5 years for the use of patents under the control of the Department in order to facilitate commercialization of new products and new processes.

The Commission established by the bill would take the place of the National Advisory Committee previously established under the Research and Marketing Act of 1946. The Commission would have much broader powers than the Advisory Committee.

The dramatic advances in agriculture due to research have made it possible to relieve a large share of the manpower previously devoted to agriculture for employment in industry, in commerce, and in our great national defense effort. In addition, our people enjoy food of unprecedented quality due to advances in the breeding of plants and animals and the control of agricultural diseases and pests. We also enjoy foods delivered to our kitchens prepared ready for use with a minimum of work and without any waste.

Our agricultural research program in this country is second to none. Let us help to make it better. H.R. 8639 is a step in the right direction and I urge that the bill be passed.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. QUIE].

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 8639 because I believe this legislation would greatly assist our program of research into the utilization of agricultural products.

In my opinion the chairman of the subcommittee, who is also the author of the bill, has done a tremendous job in bringing together the various agricultural groups interested in utilization research, with the result that they all support this measure.

In committee, I had a question about one part of this bill, section 5(b). I feel very strongly that the Executive Director of the Commission should be appointed, and have his salary fixed, by the Commission. As this subsection is presently worded, the Secretary of Agriculture appoints the Executive Director from persons nominated by the Commission. Thus the Commission can choose two or more desirable candidates, from which number a person can be selected to fill the post of Executive Director.

The subsection also states that the Executive Director shall serve at the pleasure of the Commission—meaning that at any time the Commission is dissatisfied with his work, it would have the power and right to fire him.

My question about the wording of the last sentence of this subsection—and a question I directed to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY]—dealt with who should set the salary of the Executive Director. He stated that the Commission shall set the salary, which would not exceed $19,000.

Since this is the case, the subsection is acceptable to me because, to reiterate, the Commission nominates acceptable persons, one of which is appointed by the Secretary. The Commission has the right to fire him at any time and sets the salary. In that way the Executive Director feels responsible to the Commission for his position.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the creation of another new and expensive commission in government; it is just about that simple. It was only a few days ago that a bill came before the House and I opposed it, providing for a brandnew commission for research and development in the field of coal. What has not been mentioned here this afternoon thus far is the fact that in addition to the commission, there will be set up a highly paid professional staff. Nor has there been reference to the millions of dollars already being expended upon research in the Department of Agriculture. Nothing has been said about the huge amounts of money being spent by the various State colleges on research. Where I ask you is this business of establishing new commissions in the Government going to end? I could very well be in favor of this bill. I represent an agricultural district. I am for research and development in the field of agriculture. I am for research and development in the field of coal. But, when the commission was established the other day with respect to research and development in the field of coal, nothing was eliminated in the Department of Interior, Bureau of Mines. There was simply loaded upon the research already being carried on another commission, and so it will be in this case.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As the gentleman well knows, I have a very high regard for the gentleman from Iowa and I agree with what he says in part. But, I think the gentleman has overlooked the main point in the bill. I think the gentleman has overlooked the fact that this bill replaces a National Advisory Committee of 11 men and places in their stead a commission of 7 men. You can call it a commission or call it a committee—it makes no difference.

Mr. GROSS. I cannot yield any further to the gentleman because I demanded a second in order to obtain time to offer some argument in opposition to the bill. Yes; there has been an advisory committee composed of anything but farmers, and it was an advisory committee to the entire Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ABERNETHY. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that. The gentleman is absolutely mistaken about that. The act of 1946 created a National Advisory Committee of Research consisting of 11 men. There were several other committees established. This was a National Research Advisory Committee set up under the act of 1946.

Mr. GROSS. Does that committee have a staff?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not know whether they do.

Mr. GROSS. You have the bill here. In your hearings, did you determine whether that committee has a staff?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman permit me to answer his question?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not want to argue with the gentleman. I want to try to help. Such staff, as they have, is supplied by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GROSS. Yes; and in this bill you propose in addition to the commission, a $19,000 executive secretary, plus at least five scientific and professional employees at salaries up to $19,000 a year.

Incidentally the Department of Agriculture is presently before the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee of which I am a member, asking for 41 supergrade employees.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Then there is additional authority in this bill for the new Commission to hire consultants on contracts for a period of up to 5 years—go out and hire all the consultants they want.

Mr. ABERNETHY. They are already doing that.

Mr. GROSS. But you have not had a commission up to this point.

Mr. ABERNETHY. They call it the National Advisory Committee.

Mr. GROSS. The new Commission can go out on an unlimited basis and hire consultants and research organizations.

Mr. ABERNETHY. How are you going to get research done unless you do?

Mr. GROSS. This bill provides for at least five scientific and research positions in the new Commission, plus all the researchers presently available in the Department.

Mr. COHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. COHELAN. Can the gentleman tell me how many land-grant colleges in the United States are doing research? Has this matter been coordinated?

Mr. GROSS. No; I have not had time to research this matter thoroughly, but there are many colleges conducting research.

Mr. COHELAN. The gentleman has a college in his district that is very famous for this kind of work.

Mr. GROSS. That is right.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. It is true that they are spending a lot of money on research, but most of it is going toward the production of bigger and better crops.

The purpose of this legislation is to develop industrial uses for the surplus crops that we have in such great abundance; and, therefore, we need this legislation in order to liquidate this tremendous surplus problem that faces us.

Mr. GROSS. Not necessarily, but doing research in all phases of agriculture. I recognize that.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Is it the gentleman's contention that this agricultural development and research commission would ultimately control the research that is now going on in the private institutions and universities?

Mr. GROSS. The Commission does not control them.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Would this set up a method for doing it?

Mr. GROSS. I do not know that they would exert complete control, but I know that under this bill you are setting up a new and expensive commission in Government that we do not need. This can only be justified if it eliminates substantial expenditures now being made for the same purpose, and there is no showing to that effect.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. Very briefly.

Mr. DIXON. Does the gentleman from Iowa not know that we have developed a species of corn in our laboratories that contains over 80 percent amylose starch?

Mr. GROSS. It was done without a new commission in Government.

Mr. DIXON. Corn produced in the gentleman's State has only 25 percent starch. This new strain we have will become very important. It will take 250 million bushels of your corn off surplus and use it in sizing, for paper, and packaging.

Mr. GROSS. That may be, and I repeat that it was accomplished without this commission you are proposing.

Mr. DIXON. But we cannot go on providing this experimental work longer; we are at the point where we have to have a commission to handle it.

Mr. GROSS. I cannot agree. In this bill you are proposing a commission which will be an added expense to the taxpayers.

Let me call the gentleman's attention to section 12 of the bill, on the last page, a beautiful little grandfather clause:

> The authorities under this act are in addition to and not in substitution for authorities otherwise available under existing law.

So by the very terms of the bill this simply imposes another costly operation in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill and I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I want to join in support of this important legislation, which can mean so much not only to the American farmer but also to the industrial worker and the consumer. This bill will offer added impetus to the great need for expanded research in the field of industrial uses of agricultural products. I am glad to join in support of it and to help dispel some of the fears that are being advanced here today.

I want to commend especially the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ABERNETHY] for his diligent effort in bringing out a bill that can be passed. I realize that the necessities of compromise have brought about some changes in the legislation which I had hoped could be avoided, but I recognize that under the circumstances the bill must be written in such a fashion to secure the approval of the Department of Agriculture. Mr. ABERNETHY and his subcommittee have done a splendid job of getting this legislation to its present stage.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I favor this legislation and wish to commend the subcommittee, and the committee, for bringing out this excellent legislation. It holds out great potential in finding a way to utilize the agricultural products we produce.

I testified in favor of the principle included in this bill I also introduced a bill to accomplish the same thing.

When I think of the cost to the American taxpayer, of maintaining our agricultural program, I know our people want us to seek some way to reduce that expense. If we accomplish utilization of a part of our surplus we will have done much good.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BREEDING].

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi and the distinguished gentleman from Utah for bringing this measure to the attention of the Committee on Agriculture, both the subcommittee and the full committee.

Mr. Speaker, how else can we get a reduction of agricultural surpluses through basic research to find new uses for these products?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this legislation is unnecessary. It simply adds another expensive commission to the multitude we already have and will add to the overburdened Federal budget.

There are certainly ample funds being spent for agricultural research at the present time. The large research station just outside Washington at Beltsville is doing a fine job and I might point to the fine work being done in this field by Oregon State College at Corvallis and at the many other land-grant colleges throughout the country.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate Mr. Abernethy on his fine presentation and his bill, H.R. 8639, which creates an Agricultural Research and Development Commission. It is the purpose of this Commission to seek better programs of research which will ultimately have the effect of expanding markets for agricultural and forestry products.

It is my hope that this Commission will work on ways to bring together the vast needs of our industry and the many uses which our agricultural products may be put. If more industrial products can have as their ingredients, agricultural surpluses, we will have done much to find important uses for our agricultural resources. Furthermore, the cost of items made from agricultural products will be significantly cheaper, thus benefiting considerably the consumer.

We in Iowa know that his program will benefit the industry of Iowa in a most practical way—especially those industries that could, with the help of high level research and consultation, aid in turning our agricultural abundance into industrial products. I look forward to the Commission's studies which, hopefully, will bring many advantages to the American farmer and the average consumer.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Agriculture has as many or more problems than any other legislative committee in the Congress, and I want to commend it for the difficult task that it has undertaken in resolving problems that have developed in the field of agriculture since the close of the Korean war in 1952. We all recognize that there are honest differences of opinion in proposed solutions to these problems.

The bill before the House this afternoon, however, is one of which there is complete agreement, I believe, as to objectives but with the usual amount of differences among legislators and administrators as to how best to achieve these objectives.

The objective of this legislation is not a new one. It has received attention in the Congress even before World War II when modest appropriations were made to establish four research centers to develop new uses for agricultural commodities. Although these laboratories have developed over 125 new processes to utilize agricultural commodities, they have never been able to concentrate their full effort to the extent for which they were intended.

Hardly had they commenced their work and World War II was upon us, and not only was our surplus problem immediately resolved but the resources and personnel of the laboratory were needed for the war effort. Their laboratory effort only was resumed after World War II for a brief period of time and then was also again interrupted by the Korean war. The end result has been that in the past 20 years of their existence, only the last 5 or 6 years have been wholly dedicated to the purpose for which they were originally created. This research effort in my judgment is somewhat comparable to our missile program, acceleration of activity is necessary to offset some periods of no action in the past few years. There is no reason to pause now to consider who should be named as responsible for this neglected research and development. It is only a matter of coordinating our entire potential capacity to make needed and tangible progress in the immediate years ahead.

In 1957, it was quite a different story, and I found it extremely difficult to interest many Members of Congress, even members of this committee, in the need for this program. Since I represent a highly productive agricultural area in Kansas, I was sincerely interested in the work of the original Commission on Increased Industrial Use of Agricultural Products that was appointed in 1956. Its Chairman, J. Leroy Welsh, was from our neighbor State of Nebraska, so I felt that the surplus problems of Kansas and Nebraska and other Midwestern States were viewed in their proper perspective by the Commission.

It was largely the outstanding work done by this Commission and the reports rendered by them that stimulated the imagination of Members of Congress, agricultural colleges, and even persons in the Department of Agriculture to the extent that passage of this legislation now appears to be approaching a reality.

Reviewing the history of this legislation, it appears there has been one basic question on which agreement could not be found. This was to determine whether or not the research effort should be conducted within the present framework of the Department of Agriculture or whether a separate agency should be established. I have read previous hearings on this legislation and have visited with many persons who are considered to be well informed in this field.

There are persuasive arguments supporting both points of view, but in my opinion, it would not be in the best interest to authorize the establishment of another separate and independent agency to perform this work. There are three reasons for this.

In the first place, it would create an entirely new group of Government employees and from experience we know that once a department has been created it is virtually impossible to terminate such department or allow the authorization to expire. I am convinced it could be done with less expense within the Department.

In the second place, there is an obvious need for a close coordination between the persons or department directing this research and the existing State agricultural colleges and experiment stations. The Department of Agriculture is already well aware of the location, capability, and their special adaptations and, therefore, could commence this overall project much sooner than could a new agency.

In the third place, there will be a continuing need for modifying and developing certain characteristics in agricultural products now in production in order to comply with the needs that will be determined as a result of the research for greater usage.

I feel these three reasons outweigh the apprehension held by many persons, some of whom are members of your committee and the Department of Agriculture. I believe it now will place sufficient emphasis and dispatch on this program if the responsibility is placed upon it. In my opinion, the debate on this proposal for the last 3 years has so emphasized the lack of confidence in the Department to do this work that now they are making even greater effort to offset this criticism.

Although the bill brought to the House by the committee follows the same general format as bills earlier introduced by several Members of the House, it does not authorize the newly created Agricultural Research and Development Commission to proceed in and to assume the responsibility for the research. Instead, the Commission will further study the overall problem of increased research and also methods of implementing the results of research already completed in such a way as to utilize surplus agricultural commodities. The Commission will have an independent staff and also an independent administrative operation. They are required under the terms of the bill to report at least annually to the Secretary of Agriculture and to Congress.

Also in the bill is an important provision to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to make research contracts for a period of up to 5 years with non-Government facilities for experimentation with new crops and for new uses for agricultural commodities. The Secretary is further authorized to license to non-Government facilities processes patented by the Department of Agriculture for commercial development.

I am glad that provision was made to include the available services of private enterprise in the legislation. This is a fine example of a great potential accomplishment from the combined effort of Government and private enterprise.

I note that the committee estimates the cost of the legislation to be less than $200,000 per year. I am apprehensive that the objectives of the bill can be accomplished for that amount of money, but even if the cost should exceed that amount it would be well within the public interest to invest some additional sums for research that will ultimately reduce existing surplus commodities.

It is possible to draw some comparisons to establish reasonable limitations that might be anticipated. I am told that industry generally invests about 3 percent of its gross sales into a research program both to develop new products and to possibly discover new uses for the products they have already produced. Some specialized industries, particularly the chemical, invests as high as 7 percent of its gross sales in research and development programs.

By comparison, agriculture invests only one-half of 1 percent of its gross sales in research and development. About one-half of this is provided from Federal and State sources and the other half from industry.

Even if we did invest one-half of 1 percent in a program, it would require approximately $190 million a year inasmuch as the total gross sales from agriculture were in excess of $38 billion.

Assuming that half of the amount needed was to flow from public funds, approximately $100 million could well be utilized. Even at this rate, I think agriculture would still be on the defensive in attempting to catch up to the synthetics that have preempted a substantial portion of our market.

There is no reason to believe that the research effort of our competitors will in any way decrease, so it is all the more important that considerable emphasis be placed on this program both from adequate financing as well as administrative priority.

I urge the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may need to ask the gentleman from Mississippi, in regard to the statement just made by the gentleman from Kansas, if he thinks the establishment of this Commission is going to eliminate the farm surplus problem?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I do not think anyone would come to the floor and make a claim of that kind, but I would say to the gentleman that I sincerely believe it will help. All of the agricultural organizations in America support this bill.

Mr. GROSS. Oh, well, that may be, but that is not the determining factor as far as I am concerned. I am opposed to continuing the building of this Federal bureaucracy with more commissions, more advisory councils, and the hiring of consultants to do work that ought to be done by those already on the payroll. Tell me, where are you going to get the money to pay all of these bureaucrats?

Mr. ABERNETHY. We are going to use the same money that is being paid the Advisory Committee and its staff at the present time.

Mr. GROSS. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ABERNETHY. They will use the same money that is being paid to the National Advisory Committee and certain members of the staff.

Mr. GROSS. Of course, the gentleman knows that the Advisory Committee does not have a staff as provided for in this bill. He knows they do not have, for instance, a $19,000-a-year executive secretary.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It could use the experts of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GROSS. For the highly paid employees, the clerical help, office space and equipment, tell me where you are going to get the money to pay all these bills.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have answered the gentleman's question. I realize it does not satisfy him, but I cannot satisfy him.

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. KOWALSKI. How much money is now being expended in this country for research in agriculture?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I am unable to answer that question. The gentleman might get that question answered by some member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. KOWALSKI. I think it is a very important question. If we are going to spend more money on agricultural research, we ought to have some idea how much is now being spent.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I cannot think of this bill costing any more than is now being expended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOGGS). The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that two-thirds had voted in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-two Members are present, a quorum.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

WITHHOLDING, FOR PURPOSES OF INCOME TAX IMPOSED BY CERTAIN CITIES, ON THE COMPENSATION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3151) relating to withholding, for purposes of income tax imposed by certain cities, on the compensation of Federal employees, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first section of the Act entitled "An Act relating to withholding, for State income tax purposes, on the compensation of Federal employees", approved July 17, 1952 (Public Law 587, Eighty-second Congress; 5 U.S.C. 84b), is hereby amended—

(1) by striking out "State or Territory" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "State, Territory, or city"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For the purposes of this section, the term 'city' means only a city which is incorporated under the law of a State or Territory and which had a population (according to the last decennial census) of fifty thousand or more individuals."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOGGS). Is a second demanded?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] as tellers. As many as favor the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas will pass between the tellers and be counted.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLS. The question before the House, the Speaker having appointed tellers, is on ordering a second, is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 146, noes 1.

So a second was ordered.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Under this procedure does the gentleman from Iowa control the time or does the gentleman from Missouri who demanded the second have control of the time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri demanded a second, and the gentleman from Missouri will control the time.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, present law, in general, provides that where State or territorial laws require the collection of a tax by withholding by employers, the Federal Government upon request is to enter into an agreement to withhold the State or territorial tax from compensation paid Federal employees who are employed in the State or territory. H.R. 3151, which was introduced by our colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means, the Honorable THOMAS B. CURTIS, amends this statute to also provide for withholding of city taxes by the Federal Government, with respect to its employees who are employed in a city with such a tax, if the city has a population, according to the most recent decennial census, of 50,000 or more.

The bill provides for withholding by the Federal Government only in the case of incorporated cities with populations of 50,000 or more in order to limit the administrative burden being assumed by the Federal Government. Municipal taxes which provide for withholding on compensation presently are in effect in five States: Alabama, Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

It should be noted that this bill merely provides for a method of collecting taxes already imposed by the device of withholding of municipal income taxes by the Federal Government on its employees. Issues such as the jurisdiction of a city to tax any employee or group of employees would still be matters to be settled by the appropriate courts, unaffected by the fact that the Federal Government has withheld tax.

The Treasury Department has indicated its approval of the principal involved in this legislation, and the Committee on Ways and Means was unanimous in recommending its enactment.

It should be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the cities that are involved under this bill are at the present time withholding the Federal income tax from city employees.

We followed this procedure with respect to States and territories. These cities that have this tax under their city ordinances have asked for this legislation that would authorize the Federal Government to do nothing more for them than they at the present time do for the Federal Government.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I am happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WIER. I am interested in the history of this bill in the committee of which the gentleman from Arkansas is chairman. As I get the information here, in the last couple of weeks, this has been quite a controversial bill.

Mr. MILLS. In the committee?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I will advise the gentleman that this bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee unanimously. It was not called up on the floor for passage by unanimous consent, because the committee was aware of the fact that there was some opposition on the part of some Members who are not members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. PRICE. I note in the report on this bill that there is no statement from the Treasury.

Mr. MILLS. The Treasury Department endorsed, as did other departments of Government, the bill reported by the committee which applied this treatment to cities of 75,000 or more. The committee adopted an amendment which changed the 75,000 figure to 50,000. While the Treasury Department prefers to have the bill apply to cities of 75,000 or more, on the theory that they thought 75,000 was a reasonable line of demarcation, we did adopt this amendment to make it available to cities of 50,000 on that same theory.

Mr. PRICE. How many more cities would that add?

Mr. MILLS. The best information we have, as the gentleman from Illinois knows, is that there are about 5 States where cities have this tax. We are advised by the Census Bureau that the possible total of cities over 50,000 in those States is 41. We do not know that all these 41 cities do have the tax, but that is the maximum number to which it could apply.

Mr. PRICE. Has the Treasury made any estimate of the cost of this service to the local government?

Mr. MILLS. No, we had no estimate of that. I am sure the gentleman understands, that the cities withhold for the Federal tax and what we are proposing to do is to have the Federal Government withhold from its Federal employees the city tax.

Mr. PRICE. Many localities of 50,000 population do not have the resources to pay for this service.

Mr. MILLS. No administrative costs to the cities are involved in this. The Federal Government would do the withholding.

Mr. PRICE. My inquiry was directed at the cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. MILLS. It would be very, very small. It would be a small amount of cost. No one has raised any objection on the basis of cost.

Mr. PRICE. It would not be a small amount if you had to have a separate collection agency in any city of 50,000 or more.

Mr. MILLS. The Federal Government would serve as any other employer when the payment is made to a Federal employee within one of these cities where such a tax applies. The Federal Government would do what every other employer does under the circumstances; in preparing a check, it would withhold the amount of the city tax. We expect the city to do that for us and these cities are asking us to do that for them.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. GARY. Is it true that this bill does nothing more to Federal employees than is now done to other employees in cities?

Mr. MILLS. Exactly.

Mr. GARY. It would only operate where a city is requiring other employers in the city to withhold the city tax.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is exactly correct. Some Members are concerned because there is such a thing as a city tax. This just does not affect that question one way or the other.

Mr. GARY. At the present time Federal employees enjoy a preference because there is no deduction.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is correct. Of course, the liability is there. This is simply a means of collecting the tax currently.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand it, this only applies to Federal employees who may be liable for taxes within their city.

Mr. MILLS. That is right. That is the city tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does this also include military officers who may be liable for taxes in the city in the same manner?

Mr. MILLS. It is my understanding it does not. This applies to Federal and civilian employees.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks; and I ask unanimous consent that all Members desiring to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the legislation that is before us today would provide for the withholding by the Federal Government of income, earnings, and similar taxes imposed by cities. The withholding in this case would be applicable to Federal employees and the legislation would therefore tend to equalize the tax procedures applicable to Federal employees on the one hand and the balance of the citizenry on the other hand.

This legislation does not increase anybody's tax burden. Instead, it is designed to improve the administrative technique of city tax collection.

It will be recalled that under existing law authority is granted to the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into agreements with the States to provide for the withholding of State income taxes from the salaries of Federal employees. It is appropriate that the Federal Government should enter into such cooperative arrangements with other echelons of government in view of the fact that these other echelons withhold Federal income taxes with respect to their employees.

Under the legislation before the House the authority provided to enter into agreements with cities would be applicable only in the case of communities with populations of 50,000 or more as proposed in the committee approved floor amendment. The purpose of this population limitation is to avoid excessive administrative burdens being assumed by the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation has been before the House of Representatives for some time and has been the subject of committee hearings as well as careful consideration in executive session by the Committee on Ways and Means. It should be stressed, as I previously mentioned, that the legislation does not increase anyone's legal tax liability.

In closing, I would like to commend my distinguished colleague from Missouri, the Honorable THOMAS B. CURTIS, for sponsoring this equitable proposal. TOM CURTIS has served on the Committee on Ways and Means since the 83d Congress and during that 7 years of service he has distinguished himself by his knowledge and understanding of tax matters as well as the other important legislative subjects within the jurisdiction of the committee. He has proved himself to be not only an able lawyer but is also a knowledgeable authority on the economics of taxation. Mr. CURTIS deserves the commendation of the House for his effective work on this legislation as well as for the conscientious work he does on all legislative issues.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the membership of the House to vote to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 3151.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, for many years cities of this country—in fact, all employers, all industries—have been compelled to act as tax collectors for the Federal Government without any compensation or remuneration whatsoever for the costs involved.

One of the reasons that many cities have been compelled to enact city income or payroll taxes is that the Federal Government has siphoned off so much of the tax dollar that cities have had insufficient funds to carry on costly municipal functions.

In this bill cities are merely asking the Federal Government to reciprocate, to do what is equitable and fair, namely; withhold city income or payroll taxes from the salaries of Federal employees who are employed within the corporate limits of the city. With the ever-expanding bureaucracy of the Federal Government, many cities have a considerable number of Government workers employed within their corporate limits.

Cincinnati is such a city. I regret to report that some Federal employees for some reason are among the chief offenders when it comes to defaulting on the payment of city payroll taxes. Frankly, in Cincinnati suits for the collection of the tax had to be brought against some of these workers. In my district, many who pay—as all of us do—a substantial part of their incomes to the Federal Government in income tax, resent Federal employees dodging the city payroll tax when they are among the chief beneficiaries of the Federal income tax.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased the membership of the House is at last going to have the opportunity to vote on H.R. 3151, the so-called withholding tax bill, because for the past 5 years I have been a strong advocate of such legislation which, if enacted into law, will be in the best interests of our thousands of Federal employees in the Philadelphia metropolitan area.

This bill, which permits the Federal Government to withhold from wages of Government employees income taxes imposed by municipalities of over 75,000, will definitely alleviate the hardship our Federal workers are experiencing in paying the wage tax. As we all know, total lump-sum payments are now demanded and, as a result, a majority of these people are forced to obtain outside loans at exorbitant interest rates in order to meet the tax deadline. Many of them cannot negotiate such a loan and become involved in civil suits. Of course, a few refuse to pay the tax and are arrested and jailed.

My files contain letters from postal and Federal unions as well as from individual citizens who favor the enactment of this bill. These people believe the withholding of the tax would not create a hardship on them and would be the most convenient method for them to meet this obligation.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the immediate passage of this bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, ever since coming to Congress I have been very interested in the problem posed by H.R. 3151, sponsored by Congressman CURTIS, which I strongly oppose. The proposal would compel the Federal Government to collect taxes for local governments. This amounts to a rank injustice to residents of New Jersey who are employed in Philadelphia. Taxes are imposed for services rendered by a government, but what services does Philadelphia render to my constituents, who must pay the same taxes as Philadelphians, who receive all the benefits and services provided by that great city? To set the Federal Government up as a collector of such taxes creates as much resentment among my constituency as taxation without representation created in the hearts of the original colonists.

Can there be any question about the injustice of taxing residents of the State of New Jersey who go directly to a place of work on Federal property protected and maintained by the Federal Government? Why should they pay tribute to Philadelphia? The Philadelphia Navy Yard employees receive no services of the city. The Navy provides its own fire and police protection. There is a reason why constitutents of mine have gone to jail rather than pay this noxious tax. None of us love taxation, but we have to have a pretty strong feeling of injustice to face jail in protest against a tax. It bespeaks a real confidence that when dramatically demonstrated to be so unfair, such injustice shall not prevail in this country.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE FRANK THOMPSON, JR., A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. THOMPSON. There is real hope, I think, that the present unfair tax treatment of the citizens of New Jersey who reside in New Jersey and work in New York will be ameliorated in the near future.

These hearings this morning are deeply appreciated by the citizens of New Jersey, for they demonstrate the interest of the Congress in this matter and they are most helpful to a solution which will be equitable to those most directly involved.

These taxes have been levied for a long time, and they are not going to be ended overnight. But the fact that the Congress is holding hearings shows that justice, though sometimes tardy, is on the way.

It has been estimated that 174,000 New Jersey residents pay approximately $23 million in nonresident income taxes annually to the State of New York on income earned in that State.

On the other hand, 50,000 New Yorkers working in New Jersey pay no income taxes to the State of New Jersey.

This, of course, parenthetically, is partly the fault of New Jersey. Both political parties will convene this week or next week, and piously both of them will incorporate a no-new-tax plank in their platform, a completely unrealistic position, in my view.

Nevertheless, the New Yorkers do not pay New Jersey taxes.

Each of 20,000 New Jerseyites pay approximately $30 a year to Philadelphia. A substantial number of New Jersey residents also pay sizable sums yearly to the State of Delaware under its personal income tax law.

New Jerseyites are not contending that they should not pay taxes to the State of New York, Philadelphia, or the State of Delaware. The question as New Jerseyites see it is how to protect themselves from double taxation on out-of-State income they earn.

It is extremely interesting to note that reciprocity agreements exist between New York State and 15 other States, all of which impose income taxes. These reciprocal agreements cushion the impact of these levies on nonresidents to some degree. In general, these agreements provide that a taxpayer can credit taxes paid to another State against this liability to his home State.

No such reciprocal agreements exist between New York State and the States of New Jersey and Connecticut.

In seeking relief from out-of-State taxes, New Jerseyites are completely dependent upon the good will and the sense of justice of the citizens of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—their neighbors.

New Jersey is barred from taking a number of steps to defend themselves which suggest themselves.

They are barred by their own sense of justice.

In addition, the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution bars New Jersey from taking reprisal measures which some feel the circumstances dictate.

A number of bills seeking equity in this matter have been introduced in the Congress and referred to this distinguished committee.

Among these bills are some seeking a constitutional amendment, but this route seems most unpromising to me since such measures require the assent of 38 of the 50 States. How such assent could reasonably be expected to be obtained at a time when 32 of the 50 States are taxing nonresidents is difficult to see.

I recognize that the ideal solution to this situation might well be a constitutional amendment. However, I question the judgment or the vision of those who consider it feasible at any time in the near future, although by no means do I question their motives or the fact that this would be the ideal situation.

In this connection I note that Joseph H. Murphy, Commissioner of Taxation and Finance of the State of New York told the Senate judiciary subcommittee that the State of New York was "unalterably opposed" to any constitutional amendment restricting a State's power to tax nonresidents. He added, that the New York tax was "not an equitable system on deductions."

You can be certain that the 32 States presently taxing nonresidents would, likewise, be unalterably opposed to such a constitutional amendment restricting their taxing powers.

They would fight such an amendment to the bitter end, in my opinion.

I now come to a second point, the court decisions upholding the power of a State to tax in-State income of nonresidents which have prevailed for nearly 40 years and the extreme unlikelihood of a judicial change of mind which seems as remote a possibility as the constitutional amendment route.

The reports of the Special Committee on Interstate Taxation of the Federal Bar Association of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, and the Subcommittee of the State Taxation Committee of the New Jersey Bar Association hold out no hope whatever for a judicial change of mind on this subject of a State's right to tax nonresidents on income earned within its borders.

The treasurer of the State of New Jersey, Aaron K. Neeld, testifying before the New Jersey Commission on Out-of-State Taxation of New Jersey Residents, reviewed these matters and then said:

"Though reversal of the longstanding decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court appears highly improbable and relief by constitutional amendment seems very doubtful, there is an area within the reach of legislation where some benefit can be provided for the nonresident taxpayer. This relates to a broadening of the deductions allowed to nonresidents under the New York personal income tax law so as to make them more nearly comparable to those allowed residents. It has no application to the Philadelphia wage tax since in determining that tax no deductions are allowed from gross wages to either residents or nonresidents, nor to the Delaware personal income tax, as identical deductions are allowed to both residents and nonresidents in that State."

New York permits its citizens to deduct from gross income, in determining the amount of taxes they shall pay, the municipal taxes on their residence property, Federal amusement, telephone, and safe-deposit-box rental taxes, sales taxes, motor fuel taxes, interest on their residence property, mortgage and personal loans, medical expenses and premiums paid for hospitalization insurance, life insurance premiums paid up to $150, alimony payments, and gifts for charitable, religious and benevolent purposes.

On the other hand, New Jersey residents working in New York may deduct from their gross income only an amount equal to 10 percent of such income or $1,000, whichever is less.

A fair system of taxation would permit the New Jersey resident to claim as deductions not only those expenses incurred in connection with his New York income but, also, those deductions ordinarily allowed resident New York taxpayers.

Deductions for taxes, interest on indebtedness, medical expenses, gifts to charity, et cetera, should be allowed the New Jerseyite working in New York so as to provide a more equitable basis upon which to determine the extent of his tax liability to New York.

Where the New Jerseyite's entire income is from employment in New York, he should not be required, by curtailment of deductions permitted residents of New York, to pay greater personal taxes than he would if he lived in New York State.

If the New Jerseyite has income not subject to tax in New York because it did not come from business, trade, a profession or occupation within New York State, then the amount of allowable deductions should be prorated on the basis of gross income arising in New York to the taxpayer's total gross income.

In a brilliant editorial deploring the double taxation to which citizens of New Jersey and Connecticut have been and are being subjected by New York, the New York Times said on April 20, this year, that:

"New Jersey and Connecticut support State and local government completely without personal income taxation. Each raises its revenue otherwise, by real estate taxation, by sales tax, by both, or by other forms of taxation. But one way or another the resident pays the full bill for government in those States.

"If he comes into New York to earn his living, he also fully supports the New York State government. In the Rockefeller budget of about $2 billion $634,600,000 goes to State aid to localities for education. The man from New Jersey or Connecticut is helping to foot this bill, and when he gets home at night he writes a check for real estate taxes to support his local school in New Jersey or Connecticut."

I submit that nothing could be clearer than that, and it is becoming equally clear to New York's political leaders.

For instance, Senator JACOB K. JAVITS told the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee that Governor Rockefeller had told him and Senator KEATING that he was "eminently desirous" of working this problem out at the State level. Governor Rockefeller has himself assured New Jerseyites he wants to work this problem out equitably.

He said that to Governor Meyner in the past, and only yesterday I understand he said substantially the same thing to State Senator Jones.

The position taken by New Jersey in this matter of taxation of its citizens by other States is eminently fair, and its very fairness and the high-minded way in which New Jersey is presenting its case is carrying conviction to, and is recognized by, fair-minded citizens and voters of our neighboring States.

This is all to the good, since it is the only way that our New Jersey citizens will obtain justice in this matter.

The interstate compact approach embodied in my own H.R. 4175 and similar bills before this committee sponsored by members of the New Jersey delegation would give congressional approval to agreements between the States looking toward uniform tax treatment of nonresidents.

I recognize the tradition that in the usual course of events, these compacts are entered into and then approved. I think in this instance a departure from that usual tradition is indicated in order to alleviate this very bad situation, because I feel that unless there is the opportunity presented to it by the Congress, the action by the States will not be forthcoming, except on a one-State-to-another basis, rather than a larger or broader basis.

By the enactment of H.R. 4175 and similar bills Congress could make clear its own deep interest in an expanded program of reciprocity between the States which would provide uniform tax treatment of residents and nonresidents.

The enactment of such legislation would be of the very greatest assistance, I feel, in working these matters out.

New Jersey demands only that its citizens be treated fairly.

The fact that New Jersey does not have an income tax is not something that New York State should take advantage of any longer.

An interstate compact between New Jersey and New York which had congressional approval and support would permit these two States to make binding agreements containing penalties and other provisions.

The New York Times, in the editorial I referred to earlier, made the point that New York State officials are exaggerating the benefits the citizens of New Jersey who work in New York enjoy. What else can one expect from officials who are hard pressed to pay for the services provided the citizens of New York State? However, the extreme statements of some New York officials are not believed by the fairminded citizens of the State of New York and, I suspect, they are not believed by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller. The editorial declares that:

"Governor Harriman appointed Theodore Tannenwald, Jr., to study this question of inequitable treatment of the nonresident taxpayer. Now Joseph H. Murphy, Governor Rockefeller's commissioner of taxation and finance, has taken over. Neither of these experts, based in New York, has been able to detach himself fully from provincialism. Each exaggerates, in our opinion, the benefits the nonresident enjoys from New York services."

The New York Times concludes that:

"If New York wants to be just, the tax politicians will have to start their inquiry from the home in New Jersey or Connecticut and work upward, searching for fairness to the individual, not necessarily to the State."

I should like to point out that New Jersey does have some recourse to methods, other than the inherent fairness of its case, to bring this matter of unjust taxation vividly to the attention of New York officials and citizens.

Earlier this month, for instance, the New Jersey Attorney General's office called on the Prudential Insurance Co. to stop withholding New York taxes from residents of New York who work for Prudential in New Jersey.

The Prudential Co. was advised by Deputy Attorney General David M. Satz that such withholding practices were illegal under the statutes of New Jersey. Mr. Satz acted after the Prudential Co. announced it had been deducting the New York income tax from wages of 100 employees since April 1 of this year.

The New Jersey Wage Payment Act expressly forbids tax deductions, other than Federal, from the wages of any employee in the State. New Jersey has no income or local wage tax, and New York State has asked that this Wage Payment Act be modified.

Perhaps New Jersey should refuse to "roll over" in this instance.

This spirit of independence can be infectious. Yesterday, New Jersey's Republican State senators, through one of their members, proposed a barter with New York and offered to approve commuter legislation—in which New York is deeply interested—in exchange for action to eliminate discrimination with regard to taxes on residents of New Jersey.

This is a doubtful approach, but perhaps politically fruitful. I think that this could lead to all sorts of vendettas between the two States. And it might be extremely appealing to the residents of New Jersey, who are treated so unfairly, but I do not think that it does credit either to Governor Rockefeller's integrity, based on his promise to Governor Meyner earlier, or to the attitude toward other human beings that the people of New Jersey have and are so proud of.

I think that New Jersey should continue to look for ways and means with which to bring this tax situation to the attention of New York's political leaders and citizens.

A ship, you know, has a Plimsoll mark so that it will not be overloaded.

A willing horse is often worked to death.

But a mule refuses to carry more than is good for it.

Perhaps more mulishness in this tax matter by New Jersey would help. I do not know.

Perhaps New Jersey must be less docile regarding these taxes.

I think, however, that we have got to be reasonable and realistic, and we have got to take the politics out of this business.

Doubtless there are a number of sound steps which can be used to bring home to New Yorkers the injustice of the taxes they levy on their New Jersey neighbors, and I think these steps should be taken. The matter will be resolved by the fairminded people of both States. I have no doubt about it.

I would like to include, Mr. Chairman, the New York Times editorial which I have quoted, and to say in conclusion that it is my firm conviction that although the constitutional amendment approach would be ideal, it is unrealistic.

It is my equally firm conclusion that this body, if it does have a tradition of waiting until the compacts are entered into before ratifying them, in effect, should depart from that procedure in these instances, especially in view of the fact that so much talk of reprisal is going on. The people who pay the Philadelphia tax and the New York and Delaware taxes are very upset about this, and I think with reason. I do not think, however, that any war between the States in the form of legislative reprisals is the answer. I think that the answer resides entirely in the Congress at this point. The Congress at least can give its stamp of approval to the principle so that the States can go forward and enact constructive legislation and enter into equitable compacts.

A bill granting the consent of Congress to the several States to enter into compacts providing for the uniform tax treatment of nonresidents

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby given to any two or more States to enter into compacts designed to provide uniform tax treatment of nonresidents through agreements not to discriminate between residents and nonresidents in the levying and collection of taxes.

SEC. 2. No compact shall be effective until it has been ratified by the legislatures of each of the States who are a party to it and it is thereafter approved by the Congress of the United States.

GETTING SOMEWHERE AT LAST?

Is hope for relief of New Jersey residents from Philadelphia's wage tax really beginning to dawn?

Perhaps so. Certainly the statement issued by Mayor Dilworth after his meeting with members of the Commission on Out-of-State Taxation of New Jersey Residents is the most conciliatory on the subject that he has issued in many a year, if not the most conciliatory any mayor of Philadelphia has ever made.

"We believe our wage tax to be a fair means of raising needed revenue for our city government, but we understand how New Jersey residents feel about it," Dilworth says. "We recognize that we are the center of a great metropolitan area and should do all in our power to assure a fair and equitable tax system for all those living, working, or doing business in the area."

Willingness to appreciate that New Jersey victims of the tax really believe they have a justifiable grievance has not always characterized the attitude of Philadelphia officials. Neither has the emphasis Mayor Dilworth lays on fairness, not only to the people of Philadelphia but to everyone within the metropolitan area.

So long as Philadelphia approaches the problem in the way in which Mayor Dilworth now defines it, and with the stress he puts on fairness to everyone concerned, he and the city may be assured that nonresidents will reciprocate and join in the effort to work out the most equitable tax system possible within the area.

State Senator Dumont, chairman of the commission, points to the incontrovertible fact that the courts have upheld the right of municipalities to levy nonresident taxes like Philadelphia's. But he hopes eventually it may be possible to have the taxes Philadelphia and New York State levy on Jerseyites set at a lower rate than for their own residents.

This would be based on the altogether sound premise that nonresidents do not receive as much service from the taxing government as it provides for its own citizens, and should be taxed only in rough proportion to the amount of service they do receive.

Should New York and Philadelphia accept that premise and modify their present taxes accordingly, it might be possible, as Dumont hints, that New Jersey would strike a bargain with them and pass legislation to withhold taxes from wages paid their residents who work in this State. This might work out to the mutual advantage of all.

Whether the Philadelphia meeting eventually turns out to have paved the way to any concrete results along these lines cannot be foretold now. But it is encouraging to note that it was held in a friendly atmosphere, which has not always been the case in interchanges over the wage tax, and that counsel for Philadelphia and the commission are to meet again late this month to discuss the issues involved.

Where both sides are willing to negotiate such matters in a spirit of amicable give and take, it is always possible that benefits to both will result.

NEW JERSEY GROUP AND DILWORTH TALK PAY TAX

The Commission on Out-of-State Taxation of New Jersey Residents conferred Tuesday with Mayor Dilworth, of Philadelphia, on that city's wage tax as applied to nonresidents of the city.

Headed by Senator Wayne Dumont, Jr., other members of the commission attending the meeting in Dilworth's office were Assemblyman C. William Haines, R. Burlington, Arthur L. Gleason, John H. Reiners, Jr., William Miller, counsel and secretary, and Samuel A. Alito, research associate.

FRIENDLY MEETING

Following the closed meeting, Dilworth said it had been "a friendly one and covered much ground and that it would be followed by another meeting between counsel for Philadelphia and the commission."

"We believe our wage tax to be a fair means for raising needed revenue for our city government," said Dilworth, "but we understand how New Jersey residents feel about paying it. We recognize that we are the center of a great metropolitan area and should do all in our power to assure a fair and equitable tax system for all those living, working, or doing business in the area."

Dumont, after endorsing Dilworth's statement that the meeting was friendly and covered much ground, said "we must realize that high courts have upheld the right of municipalities to levy taxes on nonresidents in the form of income or wage taxes."

MANY PROBLEMS

"We hope that some benefit may result from the meeting of counsel from both sides. There are many problems involved but we hope something may be worked out not only to the benefit of New Jersey residents, but those from other areas subjected to the tax," he said.

Dumont said he hoped ultimately that it might be possible to have New Jersey residents pay a lesser tax than residents.

"Withholding of taxes from the wages of out-of-state residents is not legal in New Jersey," he said. "If we could get a better tax rate for our residents who work out of the State, it may be possible to pass enabling legislation for the withholding of taxes from wages paid by New Jersey firms."

Following the meeting, Reiners said that a meeting between Philadelphia City Solicitor David Berger and William Miller had been arranged for May 28, in City Hall Annex.

AFL LEADER CITES FIGHT AGAINST TAX

ATLANTIC CITY, May 16.—The hue and cry over the taxes New Jerseyites who work in New York and Pennsylvania have to pay to those States should serve as a lesson to politicians to heed the proposals of organized labor, the secretary of the New Jersey AFL said tonight.

Vincent J. Murphy said in a speech before the New Jersey State Building and Construction Trades Council convention here that the AFL launched a campaign to abolish the taxes 17 years ago, "but it fell on the ears of disinterested politicians."

Murphy said he made the issue a part of his campaign for Governor in 1943, when he ran on the Democratic ticket.

But in exchange for his proposal to abolish the taxes, the labor leader said, he was accused of advocating a State income tax for New Jersey.

"We have always been interested in the welfare of all of the people in the State," Murphy said, "and it is about time the politicians come to the realization that the working people are learning what it is all about."

He added that there is no reason "why we have to go to the legislature year after year and beg for what is right and just."

This is the case, the labor leader said, in the AFL demands for broader coverage in unemployment insurance, temporary disability benefits and workmen's compensation.

The Building Trades Council passed a resolution petitioning the Governor and the legislature to use every legal means either to get New York and Pennsylvania to stop taxing New Jerseyites or to provide for reciprocation.

Earlier in the day, Sol Maso, of Paterson, president of the council, called on organized labor to drive home to the public that, as a whole, unions are democratic and law abiding.

Decrying what he called assaults on the labor movement in Senate committee hearings, Maso said:

"It is especially important in these times to preserve our good public relations against the assault on organized labor by nonunion groups who are attempting to cast mud on all of organized labor by seizing on headlines."

TALKS TO EASE TAX ON NONRESIDENTS OPEN WITH JERSEY—ALBANY AND TRENTON AIDS REPORT A "HARMONIOUS EXCHANGE" OF DATA

(By Douglas Dales)

Committees representing the New York and New Jersey Legislatures began negotiations yesterday to resolve the complaint of nonresidents that the New York income tax law discriminate against them.

The meeting was mainly exploratory and the conferees said in a statement that there had been "a harmonious exchange of information in a spirit of interstate cooperation." Negotiations will be resumed early in September.

The main complaint of nonresident taxpayers, of whom there are 200,000 or more, is that the New York law does not permit them to itemize deductions. Instead they have been permitted to claim a flat deduction of 10 percent, but not more than $500. This year, the ceiling was raised to $1,000.

The statement issued as the 2-hour meeting ended said three subjects had been taken up. They were the income tax deductions available to nonresidents; interstate exchange of information and cooperation in tax enforcement, and the possible use of an interstate compact in regard to common tax problems of the two States.

Yesterday's meeting was believed to be the first time that representatives of the two legislatures had negotiated on the problem.

JERSEY'S AID SOUGHT

The groundwork for the discussions was laid in May at a meeting between Governor Rockefeller and members of the New Jersey Commission on Out-of-State Taxation. The Governor said then that he would recommend "an equitable solution" in his annual message to the legislature next winter.

The reference in yesterday's statement to an "exchange of information and cooperation in tax enforcement" was seen as a bid to New Jersey officials to soften their attitude toward New York.

When New York instituted a withholding system for the collection of income taxes last April, Gov. Robert Meyner issued orders that New Jersey concerns employing New Yorkers were not to withhold taxes. About 50,000 New York residents work in New Jersey. Governor Meyner also directed that employers give no information to Albany on these employees.

Mr. Meyner indicated, however, that his attitude might change if some relief were granted his constituents who work in New York.

One of the matters taken up yesterday was the report made last November on the nonresident tax to Gov. Averell Harriman by Theodore Tannenwald, Jr. One suggestion in the report was that nonresidents be allowed deductions and exemptions in the proportion that their New York income bore to their total income.

Some of the figures in the report, it was pointed out, have become obsolete because of changes in the tax law made last winter.

CONNECTICUT SESSION PLANNED

Albert C. Petite, who has been designated to represent State Tax Commissioner Joseph H. Murphy on the New York committee, said a meeting with officials from Connecticut would probably be held separately before the next meeting with the New Jersey representatives.

Yesterday's meeting was held in Governor Rockefeller's office at 22 West 55th Street.

Besides Mr. Petite, the New York negotiators were John J. Sullivan of Buffalo, representing Majority Leader Walter J. Mahoney, and William Embler of Albany, representing Speaker Joseph F. Carlino of the assembly. State Senator Elisha T. Barrett, Republican of Suffolk, and chairman of the joint legislative committee on interstate cooperation, sat in as an observer.

The New Jersey delegation was composed of Senator Wayne Dumont, Jr., Republican of Warren, who is chairman of the Commission on Out-of-State Taxation; Assemblyman Elmer Matthews, Democrat of Essex, and William Miller of Princeton, counsel to the commission.

THREE STATE NEGOTIATORS TO MEET JERSEY UNIT ON NONRESIDENT TAX

(By Douglas Dales)

A three-member committee has been designated to negotiate with New Jersey on a solution to the complaints about New York's nonresident income tax.

The committee represents the Rockefeller administration and the New York Legislature. On Thursday or Friday it will hold its first meeting with representatives of the 12-member New Jersey Commission on Out-of-State Taxation. The meeting will be held here.

New York's negotiators will be Albert C. Petite, a New York City tax attorney designated by State Tax Commissioner Joseph H. Murphy to serve as his deputy; John Sullivan of Buffalo, appointed by Majority Leader Walter J. Mahoney of the senate and William Embler of Albany, designated by Speaker Joseph F. Carlino of the assembly.

RELIEF PLAN TO BE DRAFTED

Mr. Petite has been serving since last January as a consultant to the State's department of taxation and finance on the revision and simplification of the tax law. Both Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Embler have been consultants to the Republicans in the senate and assembly, respectively, for several years.

As a result of the series of meetings starting this week, the committee will draft a program of tax relief for nonresidents to be submitted by Governor Rockefeller to the legislature next winter.

The groundwork for interstate negotiations on the subject was laid last May 4 at a meeting of Governor Rockefeller with members of the New Jersey commission.

In a statement after that meeting, Mr. Rockefeller said he expected to recommend some form of adjustment in his annual message that would "constitute an equitable solution."

As its representatives at the New York negotiations, the New Jersey commission last week designated Senator Wayne Dumon, Jr., Republican of Warren County; Assemblyman Elmer Matthews, Democrat of Essex, and William Miller, commission counsel. Senator Dumont is the chairman of the commission.

JERSEY CHIEF OPTIMISTIC

"It looks very good for a settlement of of this issue," Senator Dumont said. "The very fact that New York has named its three certainly indicates interest in resolving the problem."

The complaint of the nonresidents working in New York State is that they are treated differently from residents in the matter of deductions on income tax returns.

Nonresidents have not been permitted to itemize deductions but have been allowed instead a flat credit of 10 percent of their gross New York income, this credit not to exceed $500.

As a result of this difference in credits for deductions, the nonresident has been paying about 45 percent more in taxes than the resident with similar income and a similar number of exemptions.

FIGURES ON NONRESIDENTS

In 1956, the last time the department of taxation and finance made a check, 190,000 nonresidents were paying New York income taxes. Most of them, 137,000, were living in New Jersey, 20,000 in Connecticut and the rest in other States. In that year the nonresidents paid a total of $33 million in taxes.

A report submitted to former Gov. W. Averell Harriman last November suggested that nonresidents might be permitted to make deductions in the proportion that their New York income bore to their total income.

Since then the tax department has estimated that this would cost the State $4,500,000 a year. If deductions were permitted without prorating, the State's loss would be $6,200,000, the study showed.

With the start of the withholding system for State income taxes last April, nonresidents and residents were treated equally with respect to taxes withheld. However, unless the law is changed before next April 15, when individual income tax reports are due, the present system of a flat reduction for nonresidents will be in force.

STATEMENT OF GOV. ROBERT E. MEYNER, OF NEW JERSEY, TO SUBCOMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, U.S. SENATE, AT HEARINGS APRIL 15, 1959, ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 29 AND SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 67

It is appropriate to appear before this distinguished committee on the day which has become known throughout our Nation as Income Tax Day. Not too many years ago, it coincided with the ides of March, but the foreboding significance of that date happily does not apply to April, in which the ides do not fall on the 15th.

The effect of State income taxes on nonresidents is a troublesome one, with many aspects of plain injustice. Most of the technical aspects fall outside the scope of the two proposals to amend the Constitution of the United States which are before you. I will not explore them except as may be essential to a proper understanding.

It would be of little help to talk about the fine points of existing law. The decisional law in our highest Court is too meager to display any distinct pattern of policy. Besides, we are concerned with what the law ought to be, in reason, in fairness, and in justice, and not with what it seems to be today.

There is an important point to keep in mind: the nature and degree of the injustices of existing income tax laws imposed by the States will vary considerably—not only according to what is in those laws but also according to the number, proximity, and relationship of the nonresidents upon which their heavy impact falls.

There are some States with income tax laws, I am sure, where population is thin and where there are not great clusters of residents of other States who daily work within the taxing State. I am sure that Arizona, for example, whose entire population is less than that of Essex County, N.J., has relatively few daily commuters from California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, or New Mexico. The same is doubtless true of Montana, Oregon, Idaho, and Utah with respect to their bordering States.

Very much different, however, is the nature and degree of the problem in my State, where some 155,000 or more New Jersey residents, mostly just across the Hudson River, felt the impact of about $23 million in taxes levied on their incomes by the State of New York in 1957.

These people are close together; they are close to New York, and they have an intimate relation to New York because they commute there and work there. In such circumstances, the injustice of the tax law shows sharp and clear, and its aggregate mass is large.

It is sometimes said that they have no basis for complaint, because they do not have to work in New York. This is not a valid argument; it is only a convenient one. Manhattan Island has become a work center, and a vast number of people commute daily from Long Island, from Westchester County, from Connecticut, and from New Jersey. These areas happen to be the residential, suburban areas surrounding New York, and working in New York is not a purely voluntary matter. The point is that the work must be done there, and the selection of a residence depends largely on what is available and within a person's means.

It would be a great help toward a solution if many of these offices were moved across the river to New Jersey. It would reduce the impact of New York's income tax, and largely resolve the interstate commuter problem. But I doubt that New York would regard this as a solution.

I do not think any but a few of these people contend that they should not be subject to the New York income tax at all. They spend there some 8 hours, or about one-third of each working day and it is no doubt fair, since their fellow workers who live in New York must pay income tax, that they should also contribute a fair share to the cost of government. But it will never be understood, nor will it ever be satisfactorily explained, why the New Jersey resident, with exactly the same income, exactly the same family, and exactly the same expenses as his New York counterpart, should be expected to pay a tax about 45 percent higher merely because he lives across the river. It will not do to say that the courts of New York have concluded that this is legal, or that the U.S. Supreme Court would not review that ruling, in Goodwin against New York.

In fact, while it is clear that the New Jersey resident in fairness should pay an income tax to New York when he earns his living there, it is also perfectly obvious that the amount should be somewhat less than he would pay on the same facts and figures if he and his family lived in New York.

I do not suggest that the amount of his tax should be directly related, for example, to the number of hours he spends in New York. Taxation for general revenue cannot be rested solely on a quid pro quo theory, else families with many children in school and small incomes would be called upon to pay more in taxes than families with no children and large incomes.

Yet, in considering the relative fairness of the manner in which a general tax operates upon a resident as compared to a nonresident, the facts of life do not permit the quid pro quo concept to be entirely discarded. It must be given some weight, else the burden of taxation will weigh more heavily on the nonresident. No reasonable notion of fairness can tolerate this.

We know, for example, that a very large share of the tax revenues in a State like New York is devoted to the building and operation of public schools. We know, too, that there is no real relation between that activity and the presence of the nonresident at his job. Another substantial part of a State's tax revenues is used for roads, highways, bridges, and other public works in all parts of the State, and these have little, if any, relation to the nonresident who commutes across the river to work.

On the other hand, we also know that the nonresident commuter maintains the same family facilities, and bears the same family burdens, as the New Yorker does. He will have, by and large, local taxes on his residence; he will have medical expenses, sometimes extraordinary; he will pay registration fees and gasoline taxes on the family auto; he will pay Federal taxes on his telephone and telegraph messages, he will contribute to charity; he will have the expense of interest, as on mortgage loans, and, we hope, premiums on some life insurance.

None of these may he ordinarily itemize as deductions in computing his income tax. He is permitted only a standard deduction in most cases. When the New Jersey resident is permitted to itemize his allowable deductions, the only ones he may have are (1) contributions to New York charities and (2) business expenses. For the average wage-earner, this permission is meaningless because he is unlikely to have business deductions and because all his charitable contributions—let alone only those to New York charities—are unlikely to equal the standard deduction. This system favors the wealthy taxpayer who will form a family foundation in New York, make his deductible contributions to it, and have the foundation dispense his charity wherever he wants it.

Until this year, the standard deduction was 10 percent of income, with a maximum of $500. This year, the maximum was increased to $1,000, which can only benefit those with incomes over $5,000. Even this apparent benefit is wiped out, however, by a lowering of the personal exemptions. A single person used to have a $1,000 exemption, and a married couple or a head of a family, $2,500, plus $400 for each dependent. This year, these were reduced to $600 for each taxpayer and dependent, and the "head of family" category was eliminated. In addition, the extra deduction formerly allowed for children in college has been canceled.

Aside from the increases in rates at the top brackets, nonresidents will have still higher tax bills than before, and the inequities of the system have been aggravated. To illustrate: a married person with two children and an income of $5,000 would have had a flat deduction of $500 and exemptions of $3,300, leaving taxable income of $1,200. The tax on this was 2 percent on the first $1,000 and 3 percent on the $200, for a total of $26. This year, the same nonresident taxpayer will have the same flat deduction of $500, exemptions of only $2,400, and taxable income of $2,100. The tax on this, at the same rates, is $53, or more than twice the former tax.

Modern America is a nation in movement. It is especially true in the New York area that State borders have little effect upon the activities and habits of our people. This is as it should be. Yet, the present form of the New York income tax operates to impose an artificial premium on mobility of population. It represents a policy of taxing whatever the law allows, so that the citizens of New York may have the benefit of excessive taxes imposed by that State upon its neighbors. If this is within the letter of the Constitution, it is not within its spirit.

Last year, following a discussion among the Governors of New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey, each named a member of an informal committee to review the problem and submit proposals. Unfortunately, the New York member, through misunderstanding, issued an independent report with his individual conclusions, without having sought the views of his fellow members about his report. I think he tried to be impartial. Yet, his report displays a perhaps unintended emphasis, not on the simple justice of the problem but on the dollars which New York would lose by one method of adjustment or another. He conceded the injustice it is true, but he concluded that the fairest solution was that which reduced the injustice by the least amount.

The present Governor of New York was quoted early in February of this year as having said that at some time the problem of the tax treatment of nonresidents has to be examined with real understanding. On the same day, a bill was introduced in the New York Legislature which would have allowed nonresidents the same deductions as residents but only in an amount proportional to the ratio of their New York income to their total income. While by no means a full solution, this represented an encouraging start.

The legislature of the Empire State, however, concluded its sessions for this year before Easter and has gone home until 1960. It took no action on this initial step toward a remedy.

The Governor of New York has since then said to me that he is deeply concerned about the injustice, and intends to see that action is taken—next year.

To a lesser degree—though by no means less important to those affected by it—we have the same problem with respect to Pennsylvania, where the city of Philadelphia imposes a wage tax. The Philadelphia problem is especially acute because it involves, among others, residents of New Jersey who commute across the river directly to the navy yard without passing through or into any other part of the city. They are Federal employees, working on Federal property, and not only have they been subjected to a city income tax whose relation to them is most obscure, but they have been subjected to physical arrest and to penalties as the result of their natural effort to protest this inequitable treatment. It is legal, we are told. Some small basis can be found as justification in legal theory for the imposition of the tax, no matter how small the basis or how large the tax. But it is too much like the fable about letting the camel put his nose under the tent to accord with reasonable notions of justice and fairness.

We do not know accurately what Philadelphia's revenue is from this exaction. It is not suggested that the revenue is a trade secret, so it may be fair to infer that the amount is embarrassingly high.

Some mention should be made of reciprocity provisions. New York, for example, allows a nonresident a direct credit against his income tax for amounts paid to his home State by way of income tax only, provided that State allows a similar credit to New York residents. This provision is a delusion. The three major States bordering New York; namely, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, from which the bulk of the nonresident commuters come, do not have income taxes as a matter of their own policy. Consequently, the reciprocity credit is meaningless.

Dean William Warren of the Columbia Law School, who has served as New Jersey's consultant on this problem, suggests that a truly sincere reciprocity provision would be one that allowed a proper credit for general taxes paid in the home State, whatever their nature. In New Jersey, that basic tax is the real property tax. We have so far been able to function without an income tax. We ought not to be compelled to change our own taxing methods to be accorded the same treatment given to the resident of a State having an income tax.

In about 2 weeks, I understand that the nonresident taxation committee of the National Conference of Attorneys General will issue a report containing what is the first comprehensive survey ever made of the statutory provisions of the States as to the taxing of nonresidents. It will contain useful tables showing the variations in incidence of State income taxes, the exemptions and deductions allowable, the tax credits permitted, and the various reciprocity provisions in use. I am sure that the report will be of great assistance to this committee.

What should be done about these problems? There is a real risk that our Federal system will fail unless proper standards are established. Any serious conflict between the States tends toward breakdown of the Federal system, just as surely as import barriers and burdens on interstate commerce would. Until such standards are set, there must be comity and a disposition to work out these mutual problems. There must be greater weight given to the elements of justice and fairness than to the fiscal effect of justice. Present attitudes tend to dilute the value of negotiations, no matter how sincere, because the parties are not on equal terms. One does not have to give up anything; the other is supposed to be eternally grateful for each morsel.

Retaliatory legislation is not a good solution. New Jersey has no desire to retaliate against its neighbors. That course invites quarrels, litigation, and counterretaliation. Our Nation was not built on such a poor foundation. Our greatest pride is in those solutions to problems which the States have cooperatively resolved.

With retaliatory measures obviously excluded, I think both the other courses should be followed. Efforts to bring light upon the injustice must continue as they have perhaps the greatest likelihood of achieving some approach to correction, however small. So, too, efforts to place all on equal terms by a suitable amendment to the Constitution should not cease merely because the road is long and steep.

Of the two specific proposals before you, there is not a great deal that can be said by way of specific comment. The problem of constructing a fair national standard of control, to be applied uniformly in all places as paramount law, is not an easy one.

Thus, the proposals of the Senators from New Hampshire, which is in Senate Joint Resolution 29, forbids the levy of a tax on income derived from wages, salaries, professional fees, and other compensation for personal services of any natural person who is a nonresident. This approach leaves the State free to reach income from business, from property, and, in fact, from all other sources which the State may lawfully reach. It has difficulties, of course, as its drafters no doubt realize. It is open to some uncertainty in depending on the term "not a resident." In one case, where the facts could not support any finding of residence, it might be unfair in not allowing any tax at all. In another, one who is domiciled in another State and who has a residence within the State for a short period, as during vacation, might be subjected to the full tax. These are difficult problems to resolve equitably.

The other proposal, Senate Joint Resolution 67, introduced by the senior Senator from New Jersey, attempts to meet that problem. It forbids a tax on amounts received as compensation for services rendered to an employer by a natural person unless he is domiciled within the State for some part of the period or, if domiciled elsewhere, resides in the State for at least one-half of the period for which the tax is imposed; and it limits the prohibition by allowing the tax to be imposed if its proceeds are used only to provide benefits which all persons are eligible to receive.

This approach offers a solution to the problem of the terms "domicile" and "residence." However, it may be too narrow in applying only to compensation paid by an employer. Thus, those who do their work in the partnership form of enterprise would be denied the justice of the remedy. The permission as to taxes used only for certain purposes is probably intended to prevent exclusion of unemployment taxes, for example, but its generality, as well as the lack of any well-defined body of law on the subject, may give difficulty.

I would have some hesitancy about being too specific in the matter. The marvel of our Constitution and the genius of its drafters lie in the comparative rarity with which amendments have been necessary, although it spans our history from the days of the colonies, and has governed countless problems in the growth of the Nation.

Perhaps the wisest course would be an amendment expressing fundamental policy, and reposing its implementation in the Congress. It could impose the duty upon the Congress to establish by law uniform standards to be met by State legislation imposing income taxes on natural persons who are not resident or who are not domiciled, within the State; it could express the policy that the standards should guard against the imposition of undue burdens of such taxation, taking into account the lesser benefits of government received by the class, while permitting a fair degree of taxation upon their incomes.

The facts will surely change from time to time and place to place. What seems fair and just today may be incongruous tomorrow. If the object is clearly expressed, the Congress can provide the needed flexibility.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill H.R. 3151. I am opposed to it on principle.

Instead of enlarging the withholding tax provision I believe we ought to eliminate it.

So long as the Federal Government or any government applies the withholding tax we will never have economy in Government. So long as we have a Federal withholding tax we will continue to have huge Federal budgets and deficits.

This is true because under the withholding tax the average taxpayer pays little or no attention to what his Government is costing him. He becomes accustomed to living on his paycheck from which the tax has been withheld and he has little concern over the Federal taxes he pays.

If the withholding tax were abolished, the public would have to meet their annual income tax in one sum. They would then realize just how much their Federal Government is costing them and then they would really begin to scream. And when they got screaming mad, then and only then would they demand less Government spending by their elected Representatives.

The withholding tax is a gimmick to cover up the huge spending by Federal Government. It should be repealed so the taxpayer will realize how much of his salary is taken away from him to support the big spending programs.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I arise in support of the bill before us, H.R. 3151, which if enacted will permit withholding on the compensation of Federal employees of income taxes imposed by cities and other political subdivisions.

My only regret, Mr. Speaker, is that this worthy piece of legislation comes to the floor under a suspension of the rules, which, as we well know, means that it must receive a two-thirds vote for passage. I have a hunch that this bill, like so many others, will receive more than enough votes for enactment if it were being considered under a rule requiring only a simple majority for passage. Whether it can muster a 2–1 preponderance, unfortunately, is extremely doubtful.

I favor this legislation as the representative of a district which includes the city of Toledo, with a population of close to 350,000 and Federal employees numbering approximately 6,000. Among cities administering a tax on income, Toledo ranks seventh in size and eighth in the number of Federal employees.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that H.R. 3151 has everything to recommend it. It represents simple reciprocity in extending a policy already established and adopted by the Congress. This is a policy which commits the Federal Government to cooperation with the State and Territorial governments in the area of withholding and it is based upon firm recognition of their cooperation with the Federal Government in fiscal matters generally, and particularly in withholding the Federal income tax from their employees. City officials of the district which I represent have consistently and repeatedly urged enactment of this legislation and Federal employees themselves are in favor of it.

Additionally, Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3151 was unanimously approved by the House Committee on Ways and Means; the Treasury Department likewise has indicated that it regards the activity proposed by this legislation as a logical development in Federal-State fiscal cooperation. Even the President has singled out for special comment the need for improved cooperation between local and Federal tax-collection agencies.

I think it is worth mentioning, Mr. Speaker, that implementation of this legislation would impose little if any increase in expenditure by the Federal Government. It provides for withholding by the Federal Government only in the case of incorporated cities with populations of 75,000 or more in order to limit the administrative burden to be assumed by the Federal Government. In other words, it is limited in operation to cities of a sufficiently large population that administrative and tax-collecting procedures are already in existence. H.R. 3151 also contains adequate restrictions which are designed both to limit the administrative burdens of the withholding by the Federal Government and to prevent hardship and discrimination of the Federal employees involved.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government is willing. But it needs legislative authority before it can act. For this reason, I strenuously urge favorable action by my colleagues.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, may we allow the author of the bill to use some time to answer questions?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, first may I say this is the bill that was originally introduced and passed out of the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously, with one exception, authored by our late colleague, Herman Eberharter of Pennsylvania, and the coauthors of a bill identical to this are my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I intended to observe that this was always the number one bill in the Committee on Ways and Means of our late and beloved friend from Pennsylvania, Hon. Herman Eberharter. It always bore his name as reported out of the Committee on Ways and Means before, and it was always reported out favorably.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. That is exactly right. I think that perspective should be given. There have been hearings held on this bill and the committee has had it up, as I said, several times. There is opposition and it is important to understand what it is because, I think, essentially it is due to a misconception. This bill does not say whether a city earnings tax is good, bad, or indifferent. It simply says where there is a local city earnings tax, the Federal Government will give some reciprocity to the collection of it. I might state that the Federal employees in my area originally did not like the idea until they saw what it really was, that it was a convenience for them. Now they are behind it. There is only one group that could be opposed to it, and they are the ones who somehow or other think they might or should be able to get out of paying the tax.

But there is the danger of this misconception. The Federal employees find that what happens, of course, is that the city does nothing about collecting the tax as long as it is a small amount and only after it accumulates over a period of several years and becomes a sizable amount do they move in to collect. And it is at that time it works a real hardship on the employee himself. All or most of our Federal employees pay these taxes by filing returns as the law requires and there is no problem about it. But this bill would be a convenience to them. In answer to those who raise the question of cost, it actually will cost the Federal Government less, as far as time spent of their Federal employees is concerned, because they do not have to consume time with the tax or paying it because it is automatically deducted like other taxes from the payroll.

Incidentally, I want to say I have reserved most of the time on my side for the benefit of those who wish to speak in opposition to the bill because I want to be fair. I think I have reserved 6 minutes and given the other 14 minutes to those who want to speak against it. The opponents sent out a letter, which some of my colleagues may have received, which is a misconception of what this particular bill proposes to do.

The first misconception is that this would be the first time the Federal Government is being called upon to act as a tax collector for local governments. That is not so. The Federal Government does grant reciprocity to the States now, and, of course, they, in turn, are doing the job for the Federal Government. So this is a reciprocal arrangement and a very fair arrangement.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I think the gentleman has plenty of time. I do want to use my 5 minutes to explain why I think your objections to this thing are wrong.

The second statement which has been made by the opponents is that it is a burden on the Federal taxpayer generally because of the cost. I think I have pointed out the cost will actually be less to the Federal Government as far as the utilization of time of Federal employees is concerned.

Essentially, objection comes from the area around Philadelphia where the suburbanites who do not live in Philadelphia do not want to pay the tax, and that tax is actually in question as to its constitutionality. If the Philadelphia tax is not constitutional, this bill will not affect them at all; and the fact that just because the people around Philadelphia question the constitutionality of the tax, that is no reason for putting a ban and a bar on these other communities throughout the country that do want to do this. I might say that many Federal agencies and Federal employees wish to do it.

I happen to represent pretty much of a suburban district myself, partially in the city of St. Louis—although very little, since it is mostly in the county of St. Louis—where if there were any objection to this by my people I would be registering it to you.

I urge the adoption of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I have no personal interest in this from the standpoint of my constituency, because there is no city in my district which is affected but I am against it on principle.

This matter goes back a long time and it begins with the Philadelphia Navy Yard. For those of you who were not here at that time I may say that this arose out of the efforts of the city of Philadelphia trying to collect a tax from people who lived in New Jersey but who worked in the Philadelphia Navy Yard. I have been against the principle all along. I do not think Philadelphia or any other city should be able to reach out and tax people just because they happen to work for the Federal Government in that particular area.

Let me give you an illustration of how this thing would work, to bring it a little closer home. Suppose the city of Washington said it was going to adopt a payroll tax. That means that they would be going out in the suburbs in Virginia and Maryland and taxing every single person in Prince Georges, Montgomery, Arlington, Fairfax, and other counties, because they worked in the city of Washington. Maybe that is the way it ought to be done, but it seems to me to be otherwise.

They may need more tax revenue here in the District, and I am not trying to talk against that for I have consistently voted for a higher Federal allocation to the District of Columbia I have felt that the Federal Government should pay its share for the land it occupies that is nontaxable, but I do not think we should shift this burden to people who live some other place, who send their children to school someplace else, who pay for police protection someplace else. They should not be called upon to pay taxes in the city of Washington.

I listened with interest to the gentleman from Missouri because last year he voted against the Kennedy-Ives bill on the ground that he did not think it was a bill that should be brought up under a suspension of the rules, but under regular procedure. I am not asking him to be consistent, because consistency is a virtue of small minds, but I agree that this is a bill that should have been brought up under regular procedure.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. Certainly I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I think there is a very definite place for suspension of the rules, and this is a very good example, where the issue is limited. The issue is not complicated, and there are 20 minutes a side for both sides to explain it.

Mr. HAYS. I will agree with the gentleman on one thing, the issues are not complicated, but this could very well affect a lot of people in the United States, because the city payroll tax idea is growing and I think there is a very definite principle involved about whether a city should pay its own bills or whether it should reach out and have other people pay them.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAHILL].

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Missouri for his fairness in allotting time to the opposition. I am very appreciative since I did not have the opportunity of going before the Rules Committee.

I was naive enough as a freshman Congressman to believe the rules which governed important legislation coming from the Ways and Means Committee, that the legislation would be referred to the Rules Committee and sufficient time would be allowed to consider it effectively. I also in reading the rules was of the opinion that only on the first and third Mondays of the month or the last 6 days of the session could legislation be brought up under such proceedings as we are having today. I submit, Mr. Speaker, as an important objection to the bill that this is not the place nor the procedure to follow in discussing this important type of legislation.

You know, you can tell it is August, and you can tell it is the end of the session, because the history of this legislation has been that it is always called up at the end of August or the early part of September and it is always by consent or under a suspension of the rules, and it is always under some gag rule.

I submit, secondly, on the merits, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri is in error. The letter that was sent out said specifically local governments; and as I understand it, this is the first time in the history of America that the Federal Government has ever been called upon to act as a tax collector for cities.

Mr. Speaker, this applies to only 15 cities in 4 States in the United States of America, and I say to you that the other 46 States and the other thousands of municipalities in this country should not be called upon to pay the additional burden involved in the administrative procedures of collecting taxes on Federal employees who may happen to be in Philadelphia.

Let me give you an example. Suppose an FBI agent or a Treasury Department agent who lived in Virginia was assigned to Philadelphia on a special assignment, say a kidnaping case, and he was assigned to the Philadelphia office for 1 month. I submit to you that Federal agent's salary is subject to the Philadelphia wage tax and under this bill it would be incumbent upon the Federal Government to withhold that tax and turn it over to the city of Philadelphia, for which the FBI agent and the Treasury Department agent could get nothing by way of service. Maybe I am in error.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I think the gentleman is in error. I doubt that would apply. I may say to the gentleman it depends on what has been held to be a proper and legal tax law. We are not going into what is legal. That is up to the State.

Mr. CAHILL. I submit that this law has not been declared legal. You have heard it said that the supreme court of Pennsylvania has declared this bill valid. That is true. But I submit there is no Federal court in this land that has ever declared this tax constitutional, and for the Congress of the United States of America to authorize the withholding of a tax from a Federal employee to pay a city tax, for which he gets no benefit, before this has been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, in my judgment, is not right. I could talk seriously about this bill for some time, but I heard the admonition of the Speaker and I recognize that I have very little time.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOLL. Will the gentleman inform me whether the Supreme Court has ruled on the question of a taxpayer who was arrested in the Philadelphia Navy Yard for failure to pay the tax?

Mr. CAHILL. Yes, that is true. Will the gentleman also admit that the case of Thompson against Lennox is now in the courts of Pennsylvania for the sole purpose of testing the constitutionality of this act?

Mr. TOLL. The Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of the act, and a Federal court has upheld the right to arrest a taxpayer for failure to pay the tax.

Mr. CAHILL. The gentleman knows that the case of Thompson against Lennox is now in the courts of Pennsylvania for the sole purpose of getting to the Supreme Court of the United States in order to determine the constitutionality of that law.

May I state in summary my objections to this bill.

First of all, it is the first time in American history that the Federal Government has ever been asked to collect taxes for a municipality.

Second, the tax to be withheld, for example, the Philadelphia wage tax, is an unjust tax because it applies to all workers regardless of the size of their wage and regardless of their residence. The United States Government should not aid in collecting this unjust tax.

Number 3: If enacted, this bill will require thousands of extra accounts of varying sizes and amounts depending on the service of the Government employee. It will lead to all manner and form of complex situations, such as the temporary assignment of a Treasury agent to the Philadelphia office on a special case. It will result in all of the extra cost being borne by all of the citizens of all the States just for the benefit of 15 cities in the United States, most of which are in 4 States of the Union.

The Federal Government will receive absolutely no reimbursement from the cities. It will compel a government employee assigned to a city which has a wage tax to pay the tax even though the site of his employment is by direction of the Government and not of his own choosing.

This applies to cities of over 50,000. If it is so good, why does it not apply to all cities and communities? Because the tax department will not approve of it.

This bill may well be a precedent which will lead to legislation compelling out-of-State employers to withhold city taxes and thus burden the industry with additional costs in order to aid a city from whom it receives no benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to make this very important point, and I direct it to the members of the Pennsylvania delegation, and I trust the House, if you have listened to nothing else, will listen to this statement: Pennsylvania wants the U.S. Government to collect the city of Philadelphia taxes from Government employees, but the State of Pennsylvania refused by a vote of the Pennsylvania Legislature to collect in the State of Pennsylvania the wage taxes of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3151. This tax is a very unfair tax. It is imposed by the city of Philadelphia on the nonresidents who work in Philadelphia, who work in the Philadelphia Navy Yard and in other installations in the city of Philadelphia. This tax has been fought many times through the Pennsylvania Legislature, and now the city of Philadelphia is down here asking the Federal Government to be their tax collector. If the Federal Government is going to be a tax collector for the city of Philadelphia and other large municipalities, they should also collect the taxes for every municipality in this country. There are 197 local municipalities in Pennsylvania that have wage taxes, and I am sure that every one of these municipalities has Federal employees. I was very disappointed when this bill came out under suspension of the rules. I talked this matter over with former Congressman Wolverton from New Jersey last fall, and he told me the place to object to this bill was before the Committee on Rules. Now, I woke up one morning and found out that this bill was on the floor of the House under suspension.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I kept the gentleman informed completely at all times of when we would bring it up, did I not?

Mr. MILLIKEN. You informed me you were going to bring it up, but you did not inform me that it was coming up, because I had an amendment that I wanted to offer to include all municipalities who have a wage tax.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GARY. I understand the gentleman says that this will make the Federal Government a tax collector for the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And other cities.

Mr. GARY. Is not the city of Philadelphia now a tax collector for the Federal Government on income tax?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes.

Mr. GARY. Then, what injustice is it to require the Federal Government to do the same thing for the city that the city is now doing for the Federal Government? I have no interest in this matter, but I just cannot see any injustice in it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is the Federal Government eventually going to go into and collect local taxes for every municipality in this country?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRICE. The city of Philadelphia merely collects for the Federal Government from its own employees as any employer would do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAHILL. But every city in the United States, whether it has a wage tax or not, does that for the Federal Government.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Every municipality in the United States does that for the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3151, a bill which would further extend the inequities of a city wage tax on nonresidents of that city.

Probably no form of taxation comes as close to being the modern day version of the old "taxation without representation" battle cry as this so-called wage tax, in cases where an individual taxpayer is assessed by a local or State government because he works there, even though he does not maintain his residence there.

Increasing numbers of people—including thousands in our Eighth District of Pennsylvania—are being saddled with double taxation in the form of this wage tax. They are compelled to pay a wage tax to the city of Philadelphia, for example, without receiving most of the local benefits which such a tax should give to them and to their families at home. Such a tax levy works undue hardship when it is realized that an individual working in an outside political subdivision is no less free of the heavy burden of paying the usual taxes on his property and on a per capita basis at the local level where he maintains residence—no less free than another individual who is fortunate enough to work closer to home.

This is an inequitable situation that should be corrected, simply because it is unfair and punitive taxation. It seems to me to be an intolerable weight imposed on an individual simply because his job happens to require that he work a set number of hours in another community. Clearly, this is altogether contrary to the principles of representative government. There can be no disputing the fact that an individual's first responsibility as a taxpaying citizen belongs to the local unit of government from which he expects and is entitled to receive the protection of law and order; firefighting; education facilities, including good schools; and other services. If he must pay a wage tax, it should be to that local government to which he looks for the maintenance of such services, not to a subdivision in another place altogether. I might add that this logic applies with equal vigor to a taxpayer who is required to pay a State income tax in another State because of being employed there, even though not a resident of the State that imposes the tax, and therefore not a recipient of any of the services of the State that benefits from such tax receipts.

There may be those—especially the proponents of this form of tax—who will argue that the individual who works in a plant, or office, or who is otherwise employed in a city or State to which his job takes him, is afforded police and fire protection and other services during the hours he is devoting to gainful employment. But this is, at best, a strained and faulty line of argument, when it is considered that the wage-tax levy does absolutely nothing to help the individual keep up his property, build and improve the roads where he lives, maintain the schools that his children attend, guarantee the security that he requires for his family, and otherwise underwrite all the wide ranging items of service that are an integral part of life in the community he chooses as a place of residence. And it should be remembered that, in the locale where he works, the wage earner is contributing continuously to the prosperity and well-being of that area by spending money for meals, parking, transportation, and by making purchases in neighborhood stores. Indeed, it can be said with conviction that the worker who has to pay a wage or income tax in another city or State "giveth far more than he receiveth."

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any individual should be subject to a wage or income tax in return for services not rendered. In this day of more and devious taxes, I do not believe that a worker should be subjected to any taxation that operates on the concept that a man or woman should be taxed because of where he or she works, and not where he or she lives.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great groundswell of feeling among the people of our Eighth Pennsylvania District for relief from the ever-mounting load of taxation, and for revision and updating of certain unjust types of taxation. This feeling, I am sure, is shared by people in every district of the country.

The bill now being considered gives no relief to this problem; on the contrary, as to the nonresidents who pay this wage tax, it tightens the noose by making easier the job of the tax collector in getting this tax. This bill provides that the tax collectors of the cities, and so forth, covered by the bill, need only look to the Federal employer of these nonresidents for this wage tax; their jobs are made easier by collecting this tax at the source. Furthermore, the American taxpayer at large will again feel more expenses piled on his back in paying the costs of the salaries of the additional Federal personnel that will be needed to get the wage tax from the pay of the employee to the tax collector.

I urge defeat of this bill.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BARRETT. I just want to call attention to the fact that this bill will give extreme relief to those people who work in the governmental agencies in the metropolitan area of Philadelphia. This is vitally important to those who cannot afford to pay the accumulated tax, many of whom have been assessed as high as $700. And, they are asked to pay it all at one time, or go to jail. Many of the people that the gentleman speaks of went to jail because they were unable to pay the accumulated tax.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I have only 3 minutes, and I cannot yield further. I disagree with the gentleman, because the persons who live outside of the city and work in the city contribute much to that city's economy in the way of money spent for meals, transportation, and so forth.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I have no direct interest in my own district in this, but as a member of the Budget Bureau staff in 1942 when the question first came up from the city of Philadelphia, as a tax consultant to the city of New York, the city of Denver, and to the State of Colorado, I believe I have researched this question as thoroughly as almost any other Member of this House. When the city of Philadelphia came in with its problems of withholding from Federal employees, the Federal Government had not yet adopted withholding, but was in the process of doing so.

The Federal Government has no constitutional powers to force either the States or local governments to withhold for the Federal Government. They have graciously and voluntarily done it. Some of the States, however, got tired of this arrangement when it was not reciprocal. The State of Vermont, after it had passed a State withholding law, reached the conclusion that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander. And so back in 1951–52 the State of Vermont said, "Won't you withhold for us too?" And we said, "No." So the State of Vermont impounded the Federal taxes which it had collected from State employees until the act which we are here asked to amend was adopted by the Congress.

There may be 10 or a dozen States which are the beneficiaries of that action. But this Congress had to have its hand forced in the first instance. I think it far more gracious that the Congress should adopt this amendment to make available to the cities the same rights which we give to the States.

It seems to me that we are not being asked here to pass upon the wisdom or the justice or the mercy of State or local income tax laws which have been adopted. Those who oppose features of the wage tax in the city of Philadelphia should take that up with the City Council of Philadelphia.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. CAHILL. Does not the gentleman realize from reading the history of this legislation that the sole purpose of this legislation is to force the collection of taxes from nonresidents of the taxing district?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I would question that very seriously. In any event, I would say that the Federal Government ought to do for the cities what the cities do for the Federal Government. The question could equally be raised, will we have to wait until some city impounds the Federal taxes it has collected?

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARRETT. I want again to call the gentleman's attention, and the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that in the metropolitan area of Philadelphia they have about 42,000 Federal employees and 90 percent of those want this bill enacted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not think that the Congress should be asked to pass upon the merits of the tax itself. The Federal Government should not pass either upon the merits of the case of those who may be protesting any particular detail of the tax. The burden upon the Federal agencies is negligible. The same persons who now make out the withholding slips for Federal or State taxes or for withholding may apply under the bill that we passed earlier today for health insurance, will make out this withholding. There will be no great additional burden placed upon them or additional cost to taxpayers in the rest of the country.

The question could come to us in the same form that Vermont put it to us by failure to remit to the U.S. Treasury the tax it had collected for us, and we would be forced to take this action. Let us take it voluntarily.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that this is a relatively simple proposition. It is entirely beside the point whether a tax is good, bad, or indifferent. The question is, when we do have a legal tax imposed by a State or a city, should we use good administrative procedure in its collection? Withholding is about as efficient a way of collecting the tax as we know. It is good reciprocity between the cities and the Federal Government and I urge the House to adopt this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] may follow those of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that has had very lengthy discussions in the Committee on Ways and Means for a number of years. There were extensive hearings held on the bill in 1957. It is not a question that comes freshly before the Congress. Whether or not the cities are properly exercising their taxing power is a question of constitutional law and is, therefore, a question for the courts and not a question for the House at this time. Any constitutional objections that have been brought against this bill up to the present time, have been rejected by the courts. This is a question of equality of taxes. The people outside the city of Philadelphia who live in Delaware, Montgomery, Bucks, and in the city of Camden who work for private employers have their tax withheld and deducted.

This is not a bill to tax Federal employees. This is a bill to withhold taxes owed to Philadelphia and other cities and will give the same courtesy to the city of Philadelphia that the city of Philadelphia gives to the Federal Government. But there is no reason why the people who work in private industry and have these taxes deducted and withheld from their pay should be treated any differently than Federal employees. The Federal employees, the municipal associations, the Federal employees association, the postal clerks, everybody wants this tax deducted and withheld.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARRETT] has pointed out that on several occasions these people who have been avoiding their taxes have been brought in by the city officials and have had to pay in excess of their tax in penalties and fines. This is good legislation. This is not legislation to put a tax on the Federal employees who work in installations in Philadelphia and Illinois and Ohio or in any other State. This is a request of the cities to the Federal Government to please give them an orderly method of collecting taxes. It will save the city of Philadelphia a great deal of trouble and a great deal of anguish. The situation is the same as if the city of Philadelphia refused to withhold from Federal employees the Federal withholding tax. You would have the same kind of situation if that were the case.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CAHILL. Does not the gentleman refer to residents of Pennsylvania when he refers to the associations that are asking that the tax be withheld and not to nonresidents of Philadelphia?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I refer to the American Municipal Association which says that this bill will permit the Federal Government to withhold payroll or income taxes owed by Federal employees to the city governments that have such taxes. The same right is now accorded to all of the States but not to municipalities. The cities, of course, withhold from their own employees the Federal tax.

Mr. CAHILL. Does the gentleman agree that if a Federal employee voluntarily is assigned to Philadelphia and that becomes his assigned office and, therefore, his regular place of employment even though he is in the city of Philadelphia for 1 month, he is subject to the Philadelphia withholding tax and that that tax must be deducted by the Federal agency?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. The withholding will be required only with respect to Federal employees whose regular place of Federal employment is within the boundaries of a city imposing the withholding tax. I do not believe the case you cite of an FBI agent being assigned to the city of Philadelphia for 1 month would require him to pay the tax because it would not be considered his regular place of employment.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. GARY. Would this act authorize the Federal Government to withhold any illegal taxes?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. This act does not authorize the withholding of any illegal taxes.

Mr. GARY. Then unless the tax is legal, it would not be withheld; is that not correct?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. TOLL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. TOLL. I merely wanted to point out that the opposition here is sentimental and not practical. Members of this House have their taxes withheld by the Sergeant at Arms. It is a matter of affording the Federal employees, as indicated by my colleague, to the extent of possibly 42,000, employees such as Post Office employees, Quartermaster employees, Signal Corps employees, arsenal employees, the privilege of having their tax deducted by the Treasury of the United States and then forwarded to the city treasurer. There is no imposition on outside people, but merely an accommodation for them and helps them and saves them the trouble of making their own return.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman. The Treasury Department is in favor of this bill, the Bureau of the Budget is in favor of it.

I would like to reiterate that the Treasury Department and the Bureau of the Budget are in favor of this legislation. It was reported out of the Ways and Means Committee unanimously. It is endorsed by the American Municipal Association representing 13,000 municipalities throughout the country and by the U.S. Conference of Mayors. It is supported by the Federal Postal Clerks and the American Federation of Federal Employees. Its purpose is merely to provide a more efficient, convenient method of paying taxes owed to our municipal governments by Federal employees as applied by private employers to their employees.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COAD. I would like to ask this question: If a person lives in the city of Baltimore, for instance, but labors in the city of Washington, D.C., would it be possible under this legislation that he would have to pay this wage tax in both cities?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I do not believe that would be so. I do not think he could be taxed twice.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. We could not answer a question of that sort at the moment because we are not here imposing a tax at all. It depends upon what the ordinances of the city of Washington and the city of Baltimore provided. But it would not be a doubling up of the tax. Whatever was legal we would under this bill be providing the vehicle for withholding from that employee by the Federal Government of that tax.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired, all time has expired.

The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 251, nays 133, not voting, 51, as follows:

PROVIDING FOR INCREASED USE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the Senate bill (S. 690) to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes, strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, and substitute the language of H.R. 8639 as just passed by the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill (S. 690) and insert the provisions of H.R. 8639, as passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

SUSPENSIONS IN ORDER ON SEPTEMBER 2

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the majority leader, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on tomorrow for the Speaker to recognize Members to suspend the rules and pass those bills heretofore printed in the RECORD which were not reached today.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that means the seven bills unfinished as of today?

Mr. MILLS. Yes. The House has considered seven bills. There are seven more on the list that were not reached today.

Mr. GROSS. They will be considered in the order in which they are presently listed?

The SPEAKER. They will be.

Mr. GROSS. I withdraw by reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that does not mean, for instance, that the bill which was just defeated can be brought up again?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. No. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order tomorrow under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

ELECTRICAL SWITCHBOARD AND PANELBOARD MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY OF NEW YORK CITY

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7854) to provide tax relief to the annuity fund of the electrical switchboard and panelboard manufacturing industry of New York City and the contributors thereto, and that the bill be re-referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

RESALE OF CERTAIN VESSELS TO REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday through error in the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8042) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to resell four C1–SAY–1 type vessels to the Government of the Republic of China for use in Chinese trade in Far East and Near East waters exclusively, the substitute amendment which I had was not reported. For the purpose of correcting such omission I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings whereby the bill H.R. 8042 was passed for the purpose of offering the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment for the committee amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to sell, within one year after enactment hereof, on an as is, where is basis, to the Government of the Republic of China, any two of the four C1-SAY-1 vessels, Empire Anvil, Empire Battle-ax, Empire Cutlass, and Empire Spearhead, subject to the further terms and provisions of this bill. Such vessels shall be sold only if (1) the Department of State finds that such sale will contribute to the economic development of the Republic of China and will serve the interests of the United States, (2) the Department of Defense finds that such sale would be compatible with the interests of the United States, and (3) the Government of the Republic of China gives assurances acceptable to the Secretary of Commerce that each vessel sold under this Act shall (a) remain documented under the laws of the Republic of China for ten years after such sale, or so long as there remains due the United States any principal or interest on account of the sales price, whichever is the longer period, (b) be used only in trade between Taiwan and ports in the Far East and ports east of the Suez Canal, and not engage in trade prohibited to United States-flag vessels under Department of Commerce Transportation Orders T-1 and T-2 or any modification thereof, and (c) be returned to the ownership of the United States, upon request of the Government of the United States, during any national emergency declared by the President of the United States and during any war in which the United States is participating, the compensation for the vessel to be the value of the vessel but not exceeding the statutory sales price of the vessel under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 ($1,100,000) depreciated at the rate of 10 per centum per annum from the date of sale under this Act to the date ownership of the vessel is returned to the United States, or the scrap value of the vessel, whichever is higher. No down payment of any part of the purchase price shall be required at the time of the sale. The sale price of the vessels shall be the statutory sales price, less payments heretofore made from 1948 to 1951 on account of the purchase of the four named vessels. The purchase price shall be payable in not more than ten equal annual installments with interest on the unpaid balance at a rate determined by the Secretary of Commerce after consultation with the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Fiscal Problems. The obligation of the Government of the Republic of China to pay the purchase price and interest thereon shall be secured by a mortgage on the vessel with terms satisfactory to the Secretary of Commerce. All repairs and betterments required to fit the vessels for their intended use shall be done in a shipyard in the United States at the expense of the purchaser."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WATERSHED PROTECTION AND FLOOD PREVENTION WORK PLANS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman.

REPEAL OF ACT OF OCTOBER 20, 1914

Mr. ASPINALL submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 6939) to repeal the Act of October 20, 1914 (38 Stat. 741), as amended (48 U.S.C. secs. 432–452), and for other purposes.

PUBLIC WORKS APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the President was poorly advised with respect to his veto of the public works appropriation bill and his veto message clearly indicates this.

The President says that the bill ignores the necessity for an orderly development of America's water resources within the Nation's fiscal ability. Further in the message he refers to the overall cost of unbudgeted projects as $800 million and states that this illustrates how easily effective control of Federal spending can be lost.

Is it the purpose of this message to leave the impression on the American people that Congress is knowingly ignoring sound fiscal policy in the development of our water resources? Surely the President knows that the Congress and its committees gave thorough consideration to the effect of these new starts on the programs in the years ahead. It is very misleading to refer to the overall $800 million cost without reference to the reductions in the fund requirements for the various programs during the same period by reason of completion of projects presently underway. Is it not the responsibility of the Congress to determine what constitutes orderly development in this field?

The President says overspending in respect to water resources is hurtful to the United States and to the proper development of these resources themselves. What constitutes overspending? Who determines at what level we are overspending? I believe that it is the responsibility of the Congress to determine an orderly program and the appropriate level of spending. If we are to take only the items that the President sends up without question we might as well close up shop. Congress will have surrendered its responsibility. It has always been my opinion that the function of the executive branch was to advise and recommend to the Congress with respect to these programs, not to tell the Congress what it should or can do.

Mr. Speaker, I am not too familiar with the programs of the Department of the Army and the TVA. However, I am thoroughly familiar with the reclamation program of the Department of the Interior and I want to tell this body that the President is dead wrong if he considers that sound and orderly development has been ignored in that program.

When this appropriation bill was before the Appropriations Committee, I gave a great deal of study to the reclamation program proposed by the administration and to the effect of adding new starts. With the assistance of my staff I prepared and submitted to the committee an 8-year program to substantiate and support my contention that we can have a few new starts each year without excessive pyramiding of fund requirements in the years ahead. I suggested an annual level of construction spending of only about $270 million for the reclamation program. At the same time I pointed out that this administration had neglected the reclamation program and that if this program had maintained the relative position in our overall Government spending that it held prior to World War II we would now be spending about $370 million annually, of $100 million more than I suggested in the program I submitted. Since 1952 the percentage of our overall Government spending for reclamation has averaged less than one-half of the average percentage during the 10 years immediately preceding World War II. Also, while we are appropriating more dollars we are getting a lot less in the way of project facilities.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the programs involved in this bill are programs that contribute to the wealth of our Nation and to the strenthening of our national economy. They are programs that pay for themselves many times over. Congress has thoroughly considered these programs and the impact of the new starts on fund requirements in the years ahead and has determined that orderly development and sound fiscal policy can be maintained under them. It is my hope that the House will override the President's veto so that these sound and worthwhile projects may go forward.

LESS THAN HONORABLE DISCHARGES

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include a letter received from the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate on the subject of less than honorable discharges.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, since so many of you, my distinguished colleagues, have either written to me or spoken to me in the last short time before adjournment of this first half of this 86th Congress and asked me the status of the Doyle bill, H.R. 88, companion bills to which so many of you also authorized on the same subject, I feel it appropriate to advise you before you go home to your respective districts that H.R. 88 promptly went to the Senate side of this Congress upon it being unanimously approved by the House, and it was referred to the Senate Armed Services Committee, the distinguished chairman of which I had prompt and very satisfactory conference. When we concluded our 25-minute conference he told me if the bill only helped one deserving young man it was still a good bill.

In like manner I have interviewed every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee in the premises.

Following is the text of a letter received by me from Hon. RICHARD RUSSELL, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, where the bill now pends:

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DOYLE: Permit me to acknowledge and thank you for your letter of July 14.

I have been trying to clear away some of the pending committee business that reached us before H.R. 88 but I shall see that you are notified in order that you can be present whenever hearings can be scheduled on your bill.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DICK RUSSELL.

I have asked that hearings on the bill be called as early as possible January next. I might also add that in addition to a very favorable reception which was given about the bill, expressed to me by most of the Senate Armed Services Committee members, at least a dozen Members of the other body not on the Senate committee have assured me of their cordial consideration if and when the bill gets to the Senate floor.

I make this brief statement to you by way of report so that in your respective congressional districts if there are any inquiries you will be able to thus inform your constituents.

I also want to express my appreciation to the considerable number of House Members who actively cooperated and communicated to the two Senators from their respective States their active interest in the subject matter of H.R. 88.

My present impression is that in spite of continued Pentagon opposition thereto H.R. 88 will be called for hearings on the Senate side as early as possible, as indicated by the letter from the distinguished committee chairman herein quoted, and that so far the sentiment expressed to me by a goodly number of Senators indicates that, with continued emphasis as to the necessity of the subject matter being treated by legislation, we may reasonably expect a prompt and thorough consideration.

AMERICANS, SPEAK UP AND DECLARE "LIBERTY WITH JUSTICE FOR ALL"

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, we sometimes expect a President of the United States to make those decisions which no mortal man could or should make alone.

Under the pressure of their heavy responsibilities, being human, Presidents make occasional mistakes of judgment.

Especially when they lose touch with the people.

The White House neglected to sound out public opinion, and proceeded with the invitation to Khrushchev.

And thereby presented a misleading image of our people to the world.

The invitation to Khrushchev has resulted in the unfortunate impression that our Nation is looking out for itself alone.

It has led the world to believe that we have abandoned our principles in order to make a deal that would insure our safety.

It has occasioned distrust among our allies.

It has broken the heart of the captive peoples.

Most damaging of all, it confers respectability upon communism, thereby acknowledging the moral retreat of our Nation.

The ferment of protest by the American people is rising. For no President, however good his motives may be, has the right to place us in this unfavorable light before the world.

The time has come for the American people to correct this false image of ourselves that has been created by the invitation to Khrushchev.

We will never be subservient to the Red Dictator in our own land.

And we will never abandon the captive peoples, to make an accommodation with him, or with communism.

How can we undo the damage that has been done and convince the world that our faith in liberty and justice for all is stronger than ever before?

Only by a tremendous demonstration by the American people and for freedom.

If the White House does not reconsider its invitation to Khrushchev, and if the unwelcome guest does not decide to cancel his visit, there is only one alternative for the American people and that is to mount the greatest crusade of freedom ever witnessed in the United States.

Desecration day that has been inflicted upon us by the invitation to Khrushchev falls on September 15. But our own Constitution Day is observed on September 17. This gives us the inspiring incentive and the boundless opportunity to affirm the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, before and during every minute of Khrushchev's tour, and thus score an overwhelming victory for the spirit of man.

By every medium of communication, and in every city and hamlet of our country, let us show the moral strength of our people, and the confident principles by which we live.

Let millions of American flags, and the flags of free nations, and the flags honoring the captive peoples be displayed, but not one hammer and sickle.

Everywhere that Khrushchev turns, let him see newspaper headlines, billboards, banners, and individual badges and let him hear the people of the United States—with printed and spoken words in Russian—united in the message: "Liberty and justice for all." Speaking not only for ourselves, and for oppressed peoples everywhere, but for the Russian people in the language that he understands.

Let there be orderly protests denouncing communism for its crimes against humanity.

Let there be services in our churches, mourning the victims of communism.

Let Congress tell Khrushchev to liberate the captive nations.

Let our people write to relatives and friends abroad, clearly stating our unwavering determination not to compromise with communism.

But above all—and through a massive affirmation of our faith in freedom by any and every way that communities, groups, and individuals can conceive and express—let us invite the world to join with us in creating liberty with justice for all.

COMMUNIST INVASION OF LAOS RAISES SERIOUS PROBLEMS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE POLICY

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include editorials and an article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to wonder whether the people of the country may not be ahead of their representatives here in Washington in sensing some of the far-reaching implications of the present Communist invasion of Laos. Even though the news of this serious development in southeast Asia, which has come at a time when our leaders apparently are making every effort to play down the differences between ourselves and the Communist world, has not gained top prominence across the country, a number of thoughtful discussions have already appeared in print with regard to the implications of the Communist drive into Laos, particularly its impact on our present national defense policy.

Even though we have indicated our determination to stand behind the Government of Laos, the question still comes up as to how to prevent further Communist penetration of this critical area. Are we indeed helpless in the face of this latest Communist drive? If we are, then what has happened to all of the billions of dollars that have been put into our national defense program? I think it is perhaps time that we in Congress who are charged with the top responsibility for maintaining a strong national defense should begin to ask ourselves some of these serious questions.

Typical of the thoughtful consideration which has been given to the question in other parts of the country are an article which appeared in the Oneonta Star of August 31 and an editorial in the Schenectady Gazette of the same date, both of which I include under leave to extend my remarks.

[From the Oneonta (N.Y.) Star, Aug. 31, 1959]

FEDERAL DEFENSE POLICY IN QUESTION

(By William L. Ryan)

Communist threats to Laos in Indochina and India's northern frontiers raise this gloomy possibility: In this nuclear age, aggressive communism might chew up real estate, bit by bit, in a march toward world conquest.

Such thrusts suggest another thoughtful look at U.S. defense policies. Indeed, a prospect of continued Red aggression could make defense policy the overriding issue of the 1960 presidential election campaign.

THE BIG QUESTION

Both in Asia and Europe, the question arises: At what point does a piece of free world real estate become important enough to warrant the risk of nuclear war to defend it? If no real estate is important enough for that, are the Western allies strong enough to defend it with conventional forces?

Before he became President, General Eisenhower wrote in "Crusade in Europe" that use of the atom bomb in World War II "left no doubt in our minds that a new era of warfare had begun."

"In an instant many of the old concepts of war were swept away. Henceforth it would seem the purpose of an aggressor nation would be to stock atom bombs in quantity and employ them by surprise against the industrial fabric and population centers of its intended victim," he added.

ADMINISTRATION THINKING

This reasoning apparently has dominated the administration's defense thinking. Apparently the policy bases itself on the idea nuclear weapons are so terrible a deterrent that preparation for war on conventional lines virtually loses its importance. Today, the United States alone or in concert with its allies, seems in no condition to contest with conventional force any Red attempt to expand aggressively.

On March 11 President Eisenhower observed: "We are certainly not going to fight a ground war in Europe." Is this now a matter of policy? Logically, it would mean that in case of Red attack anywhere, the United States has only two choices: push the button that would start a nuclear war, or let the Communists continue to gobble territory bit by bit.

WHAT ALTERNATIVE?

At what point do we press the button? To defend Laos, or India, or West Berlin? If none of these warrants mutual destruction, what is the alternative?

Moscow has concentrated on conventional armaments, submarines, navy surface vessels, along with its powerful program of superweapon production. Clearly the Kremlin does not overlook the possibility that should nuclear war, by its horror, rule itself out, conventional forces will rule world politics.

The A-bomb was a deterrent once. We lost the monopoly. In the standoff, the balance tended to swing toward the side with the biggest conventional power. Yet, the United States has been cutting back steadily in this field. The Russians have an enormous lead in land forces. Even with parity in nuclear and missile potential—assuming there could be no such thing as limited nuclear war—the United States could find itself facing a dilemma with each forward Communist push.

The defense policy issue in these respects soon may be forced into open public debate.

[From the Schenectady Gazette, Aug. 31, 1959]

WHERE'S THE U.N.?

Shouldn't the United States be taking a decisive part in the crisis in Laos?

It seems to be another case in which each interested nation acts unilaterally or in collaboration with one or more nations for its own purposes, to all practical purposes virtually ignoring the one big international agency which was designed—among other things—to put out fires before they become too large.

The present policy of our State Department seems to be to let the Lao settle the issue themselves. If it were simply a matter of Lao Communists by themselves overthrowing the Government by force and establishing a Red government, we would have to consider it an internal affair and not the concern of the U.N. even though we would deplore the Red victory. But the Chinese and U.S.S.R. Communist governments certainly are not taking the same attitude as the Washington administration, and if Laos goes Communist one more nation will have fallen into the Communist camp.

Congressman SAMUEL S. STRATTON in an address to the House demanded an immediate dispatch of American Marines and an aircraft carrier, saying, "Unless we recognize dangerous situations quickly when they occur and react promptly to bring our military forces to bear, all our millions we spend on standing troops and sailing forces aren't going to help us one little bit."

Mr. STRATTON'S demand pointed up a problem that has faced America ever since it began its foreign aid programs. At first glance it might seem logical, if we are going to aid these countries with our funds, military supplies, and technicians, to follow through by putting our military forces into action when a crisis arrives. But how far should we go in that respect? Suppose the first few Marines and aircraft carrier are insufficient; are they to be followed by larger and larger forces? Just how big a war are we prepared to wage in southeast Asia? We share in Congressman STRATTON'S feeling of frustration over the fact that although Laos has been getting assistance from the United States it is being taken over by Communists. But we wish to be cautious about sending our Armed Forces into the area unless our Nation has determined that it will carry a military venture through to the very end.

In our opinion the Laos crisis is not primarily an internal affair and the U.N. therefore should be taking action, with U.N. military forces if necessary. If Laos falls to the Reds with the aid of foreign Communist forces the question will in the future be asked: Where was the U.N.—why didn't it act?

AWARDS OF EXCELLENCE TO LOWELL EVENING SUN BY ASSOCIATION OF ASSOCIATED PRESS EXECUTIVES

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce to the House that at Groton, Conn., the Association of Associated Press Executives at their convention gave the second prize in large city class for page typography to the Lowell Evening Sun, a very fine newspaper in my city of Lowell, Mass.

Last year the Association of Associated Press Executives awarded the first prize in editorial makeup to the Lowell Evening Sun.

Last year when they were given the first award for editorial makeup in their newspaper, competing in the same way with large newspapers, we felt it was a great tribute to the Lowell Sun. The award for first-page typography is a further tribute. Lowell, Greater Lowell, and all of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are very proud of the Lowell Sun.

THE PEOPLE SHOULD KNOW THE FACTS ABOUT OUR MILITARY STRENGTH

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, resisting the pressure to spend excessive amounts for national defense is one of the most difficult tasks of Congress today. We have just finished determining the military appropriations for fiscal year 1960; that is, from July 1, 1959, to June 30, 1960. Now we must commence planning for the next fiscal year. Already every branch of our Military Establishment is working on its request for next year. Soon many of us in Congress, especially those on the Appropriations Committee and the Armed Services Committee, will be visiting our military installations at home and abroad studying these problems.

The enormity of our defense establishments necessitates a year-round study. Our military appropriations for this year total $39,228 million. Together with our military construction program and our appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission, they amount to 64 percent of our national tax dollar. That is a tremendous burden on the American taxpayer. The only justification for this staggering amount is that it is insurance that our country is receiving proper protection against the predatory forces of world communism.

Today I intend to discuss briefly what our defense problems are, what we are doing to meet these problems, and our successes and failures in that effort.

There is terriffic pressure to increase next year's defense budget by many billions of dollars. I am pleased that Congress this year did as well as we did in resisting pressure, although frankly I believe we should have reduced appropriations even more than we did.

One group of prominent Americans, however, is demanding that we increase our expenditures by a minimum of $7.5 billion each year for the next 10 years. It is interesting to note that some of the military equipment they are demanding that we buy is outmoded and practically useless. If next year we would spend all for defense that is being demanded, these demands would take all of our tax dollars.

Many reasons are given by these would-be big spenders as to why we should increase our defense spending by many billions. They say that America is rapidly becoming a second-rate military power and will succumb to Communist military might unless we greatly accelerate our military spending. Another reason they give is that Russia will overcome us unless we spend a billion or so for "whosit's" missile. I will later discuss what I believe to be the reasons why certain persons would disparage American military accomplishments and praise that which is alien, and at the same time attempt to sell us a panacea for all of our deficiencies and to match all of Russia's reputed greatness by spending billions of dollars at these persons' direction.

First, however, I want to summarize what American military strength is today, and to compare the progress that we have been making for the past several years. I intend to point out that which is good and that which is bad, our successes and our failures.

WHAT IS THE RELATIVE MISSILE STRENGTH OF RUSSIA AND THE UNITED STATES TODAY?

Russia fired its first sputnik in October 1957; it was unquestionably the greatest publicity stunt of the ages. The American people immediately wanted to know how Russia had accomplished this great success and what the United States was doing about it.

To my personal knowledge the Army Ballistic Missile Agency at Redstone, Ala., had been asking for authority to put a satellite in orbit with their Jupiter-C, which is an elongated Redstone Army rocket with successive stages of smaller Sergeant rockets. Our Government refused to allow this, for the Redstone was primarily a military rocket; we planned to place our satellite in orbit with the Vanguard rocket, which was a purely scientific rocket with no planned military use. It is apparent now that their judgment on this subject was poor, at least from a publicity standpoint. It is a fact that it was the Jupiter-C rocket that placed our first satellite in orbit when finally allowed to do so by the Department of Defense.

By this I do not mean to infer that Russia has not made great progress in missiles, for she has. In fact, Russia today has a rocket engine that has placed in orbit a larger satellite than has the United States, but in my opinion those conditions will not exist much longer.

I believe it is certain that the United States is well ahead of Russia in the ground-to-air missiles; that is, the antiaircraft missiles such as Nike, Talos, and Bomarc. The same is true of our air-to-air missiles; that is, the missiles fired from planes to destroy enemy planes, and air-to-surface missiles; that is, missiles fired from planes at ground targets. In fact, the only field in which Russia may be superior is certain surface-to-surface missiles. Our difficulty in that field is easily understandable.

Neither Russia nor the United States used guided missiles to any great degree in World War II, although the United States did use millions of short-distance unguided rockets. Germany, however, developed a very powerful, fairly accurate missile, the famous V–2, with a few hundred miles' range, that threatened to destroy England in the later days of the war. One of the principal German scientists who developed this V–2 rocket was Dr. Wernher von Braun, who is now the Director of Development Operations Division, Redstone Ballistic Missile Agency. Incidentally, Dr. von Braun relied greatly in his early work in rocketry on the research of an American, Dr. Robert H. Goddard, of Clark University.

UNITED STATES ABANDONS MISSILE PROGRAM IN 1947

In 1946, immediately after World War II, both Russia and the United States began the development of surface-to-surface rockets. Our development in that field was called the bumper project. The United States, however, abandoned that project in 1947. Today we can see that this was an unfortunate decision, for it was not until 1952 and 1953 that the United States revived their long-distance surface-to-surface project. Russia had at least 6 years' head start on us in this field, and it is an outstanding achievement that we have been able to practically catch up with Russia in this field with her 6-year advantage.

As verification of this statement as to our early lag in long-distance surface-to-surface missile development, I would like to refer you to a statement made by Congressman GEORGE H. MAHON, Democrat, of Texas, who is and has been for many years the chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations. The statement to which I refer was made during general debate on the defense appropriation bill by Mr. MAHON and is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 102, part 6, page 7804.

> Speaking of missiles generally, I think there is little likelihood but that the United States, in the development of a wide variety of so-called guided missiles, is decidedly out in front of any other power. * * *
> Another important fact is that immediately after World War II the Soviets began an intensive program for the development of the ICBM (intercontinental ballistic missile). This country did not. We are trying now to make up for lost time and whether we will be able to do it remains to be seen.

Later in that same year, on July 19, 1956, on the floor of the House, I commented on this statement made by Congressman MAHON—which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 102, part 10, page 13599—and said:

> The ICBM field, I must admit, is one in which there is no definite knowledge as to whether the United States or Russia is ahead in technical progress. We know Russia began her extensive intercontinental development just after World War II. We did not start until a few years ago. The element of time is the one concession we must grant the Soviets in this field. If we are behind, it is because of our inaction in the years between the end of World War II and the conclusion of fighting in the Korean conflict.

When Congressman MAHON made that statement in 1956, "We are trying to make up for lost time, and whether we will be able to do it remains to be seen," there was real doubt as to if and when we could catch up with Russia in the long-distance ballistic missile race. I believe today we can definitely answer that query in the affirmative. We have made up for the time lost in those years of inactivity after World War II. Today, what we may lack in development of extra powerful rocket engines we have more than made up in greatly superior guidance and control systems.

Last week Gen. James Doolittle, famed flier-scientist, now Chairman of Space Technology Laboratories, in a statement before the Fourth Annual Symposium on Ballistic Missile and Space Technology at Los Angeles, said that while Russia had an 8-year head start in the missile race the gap had been nearly closed, and he added that the United States is probably ahead of Russia in some ways, because in all probability we have a more compact, smaller, cheaper ICBM.

As to nuclear weapons, we are well ahead of Russia. It is known that the United States has conducted about 150 nuclear tests of all kinds; Russia less than 70. The United States developed the nuclear bomb and has stayed well ahead of Russia in that field through the ensuing years.

HAS RUSSIA FIRED AN INTERCONTINENTAL BALLISTIC MISSILE?

I have been interested in reading and hearing over television that Russia has a great arsenal of intercontinental ballistic missiles that can be fired with accuracy 5,500 miles or more. It is no secret that the United States has such a missile. It has been fired from Cape Canaveral, southeast across the Atlantic and Caribbean many times. Several have failed altogether; many have failed as to their ultimate goal. In spite of these failures, we have made accurate firings of more than 5,500 miles. Our range is "in a goldfish bowl" so to speak, so that all our friends and enemies know of our successes and our failures.

Russia's range, on the contrary, is across land entirely controlled by Russia. We do know the location of the Russian long-distance ballistic missile range. It commences just north of the Caspian Sea and goes in a northeasterly direction across Siberia. Anyone can look at the map and see that before you go 4,000 miles you reach the ocean. To the best of my information, not one of her firings has gone beyond that range. Therefore, in spite of all the publicity, Russia apparently has yet to successfully fire a ballistic missile more than 4,000 miles. I do not say that Russia cannot fire an ICBM, but I do say that no one, including Russia, knows that she can fire successfully a missile 5,500 miles until she has done so.

IS THERE A DEFENSE AGAINST MISSILES?

The United States is far ahead of Russia in antiaircraft defense, and our scientists have been studying defenses against ballistic missiles. However, the very nature of a ballistic missile—coming thousands of miles at speeds of several thousands of miles per hour—makes it difficult to destroy before it strikes its target. Frankly, there is a difference of opinion as to how effective an antimissile defense would be.

The Nike-Zeus is the antimissile project on which the United States is conducting research and development. The Nike-Zeus radar will, from the ground, locate and track the enemy missile as it approaches. A missile with a nuclear warhead will then be fired to explode far in the air, near enough to the enemy missile to destroy it. It sounds complicated. It is. Only the best scientists, armed with the most refined technical experience, could possibly handle such a program. Many believe it can be successfully operated. Many others do not. Some believe that the only defense you can have against intercontinental ballistic missiles is to be capable of producing and operating enough ballistic missiles to destroy any attacking country.

No, the answer is not simple, and all answers are not as yet clear, but I do want to assure you that the United States is well ahead of any other country in this field, and if it is possible to perfect a defense against ballistic missiles we will accomplish it.

ARE WE GUILTY OF PINCHING PENNIES IN OUR MISSILE PROGRAM?

Today it has become a habit for certain groups in our country to state that in the last 6 or 7 years the Administration and the Congress have been stingy and wrecked our missile program by their low expenditures. These allegations are incorrect. On the contrary, we have been rapidly expanding our missile program both as to quantity and quality. It is interesting that some of those who are the most critical of our missile program at the present time were in positions of authority and influence in Congress and in the executive branch of our Government at the time our missile program was completely abandoned in 1947. I would like to point out exactly what we have spent in the purchase of missiles in the last several years. I requested the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to provide the actual figures of missile production and procurement. Fiscal year 1951 was the first year for which such figures were available. The figures are as follows:

[In millions of dollars]

	Total spent
1951	21
1952	169
1953	295
1954	504
1955	718
1956	1,168
1957	2,095
1958	2,737
1959 (estimated)	3,316
1960 (estimated)	3,922

This shows an increase of 18,600 percent spent for procurement and production of missiles in the last ten years. It certainly refutes the statements that our country has been niggardly in our expenditures for missiles.

THREE YEARS AGO THE DEMAND WAS FOR MORE LONG-RANGE B–52 BOMBERS—TODAY FOR MORE AND MORE MISSILES

It is interesting that there is always a loudly vocal group which demands that one specific segment of our military be expanded to the exclusion of others and to the detriment of the entire military program. It is also interesting that this demand for a specific weapon is usually made after the "specific weapon" they are selling is outmoded.

As you will recall, 3 years ago there was a tremendous demand to step up production of our B–52 bombers in order to catch up with Russia. We were even asked to construct factories to accelerate this production. Many of us realized the unsoundness of this action and strongly opposed it. Today even the most serious critics of our military strength admit that we are far ahead of Russia in the field of long-range bombers. In fact, Russia has only about 150 heavy bombers.

On July 19, 1956, in answering the demand that we should construct more and more B–52 bombers, I made the following statement on the floor of the House, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date:

A few years ago we made that mistake when we assumed that the B–36 was the zenith of our large bomber development. Before 10 percent of the B–36's were finished they were obsolete because of the greater efficiency of newly developed jet bombers over the propeller-driven bomber. If today we should go all out for the production of B–52's, in a few years we could have the air literally filled with them; we would have ignored research and planning for far better planes which I personally know are on the drawing board.

Today we have made such great progress in the missile field that we are debating how far to go ahead with the better planes on the drawing board.

Today even the exponents of the wildest spending for defense do not clamor for more B–52 bombers.

ARMS PROPAGANDISTS MUST NOT DICTATE DEFENSE POLICY

Most of the American manufacturers of armaments are doing a magnificent job for national defense. Their capabilities and resourcefulness has been indispensable in our country's reaching the great accomplishments in that field. However, there are armament manufacturers who, in order to push their own sales, are resorting to hysteria advertising. As in other fields, often the poorer the product being sold the greater and more glowing the claims made by the salesmen.

This hysteria advertising may lead to two adverse results. Such advertising is encouraging that "anvil chorus" in America that would deprecate all our accomplishments and praise all that is alien, especially all that is Russian. Some armament salesmen are going all out to sell their products to America regardless of the need or the cost. If they have their way, we would bankrupt America.

Today tremendous pressure is being brought upon all America to spend staggering sums on armament, especially armament of the expensive, exotic type. The needed, practical equipment is ignored in this pressure. The old-time munitions salesman centered his armament selling on the military and civilian leaders of the country. Today the armament salesman may spend millions, directly and indirectly, using all communications techniques, to not only sell his program directly, but to influence officials in a much more subtle manner by selling Mr. and Mrs. John Q. Public. This new sales pitch is gaged to convince all America that the company's weapon is valuable and direly needed for defense; but also that without this particular weapon the United States is deteriorating in military strength; and that unless our Government buys a tremendous amount of their special missile or gadget, our civilization will face annihilation by Russia. This type of selling, often by cleverly planted news stories, is calculated to encourage a ground swell of public opinion, demanding that our Government spend more and more for defense. Some of these propaganda representations are so absurd that they would be humorous if national defense were not so serious to the American people.

MISSILE SALESMAN RESORTS TO TELEVISION TO SELL AMERICAN PEOPLE AS TO NECESSITY OF HIS MISSILE

I saw on television a few months ago the performance of an official of a large American corporation which is heavily engaged in the manufacture of missiles. This program was plainly gaged to convince a national audience that Russia was ahead of us in missiles, that for national safety we should stockpile his missiles in great numbers—which, incidentally, would cost hundreds of millions of dollars. This program had the desired effect; I immediately received letters demanding that the United States greatly accelerate production of this special missile program. The administration was severely criticized for not buying more of these missiles. Frankly, the program did not inspire me to believe that our Government should buy and stockpile more of these missiles, for I knew the true facts.

Actually, the United States has already spent many hundreds of millions of dollars on this particular missile which we hope eventually will turn out as planned. It is one of the three missiles still in the development stage which we are developing for the same general purpose. This particular missile has been making fair progress and has had reasonably successful firings. It has had five unsuccessful firings since the extravagant sales buildup over television; and, while we have learned something from each of these firings, each one has been an overall failure. Since these failures, however, this missile has been fired successfully three times. If and when we can remove the "bugs" from this missile so that it is operational, then and only then does it become time to consider stockpiling it. It would certainly be fiscal and military stupidity to attempt to stockpile in great numbers a weapon which is not yet operational. Our country must consider such a purchase in the light of national security and not for the benefit of any special corporation.

Modern weapons and their usage are so technical and complex that a person, regardless of his intelligence, cannot properly evaluate the truth or unreliability of these glowing and colored claims made for some of these weapons.

I know of no manner in which we can prevent these armament and would-be armament manufacturers from making these extravagant and ofttimes false claims, many of them at the taxpayers' ultimate expense. Our Government can, however, see to it that these fallacious promotional appeals do not prejudice nor influence our purchasing of munitions suited to our actual defense requirements.

If the United States bought the quantities of each and every weapon that the armament salesmen are insisting we must buy, we would wreck our economy, make beggars of American taxpayers, and we would be so weakened that we could be easy prey to any would-be enemies.

THE UNITED STATES HAS A SUPERIOR TRAINED ARMED FORCE AND DESPITE SOME DERELICTIONS IS DOING A FINE JOB

In discussing our military strength, we are all too apt to discuss material and not personnel. We forget that in spite of modern inventions, it is the courage, fortitude, training, and spiritual strength that form the sinews of real military strength of a nation.

One of the greatest problems of any armed service is to have the personnel properly trained and capable of operating the new and modern equipment. We have recognized this for several years and have radically raised our standards for draftees and ceased to take those designated in category IV. Well realizing that it is almost impossible to properly train our modern military technicians in a short time, we have taken many steps to increase reenlistments, such as: increasing pay, incentive pay, better housing, and improving the life of the military man in many ways.

I am happy to say that we have greatly increased our reenlistments. We have been able to greatly lower the draft quota. Today the Air Force and Navy are all volunteers and 51½ percent of the enlisted personnel of the Army are on their second or subsequent enlistments. This accounts in a great degree for the American superior ability to handle modern and complex equipment. The American Armed Forces are today the finest on earth. This was well demonstrated in our landings in Lebanon a year ago in July. I discussed this operation in detail on the floor of the House earlier this year. Without discussing the reasons or justification for these landings, I want to point out that militarily these landings demonstrated the very highest in individual and unit training, esprit de corps, and superior equipment. The landings were so successful that Russia, after one blast of opposition, said nothing further, because she did not want to attract attention to American success. Anyone who has seen the Russian soldier on the streets—they cannot be seen on maneuvers—can immediately realize the superior military bearing of the U.S. soldier.

I have recently been worried as to newspaper and magazine stories accentuating the crimes and derelictions of our young men in the armed services. Parents understandably worried as to these stories have discussed them with me. I do not intend to minimize these stories. I am not 100 percent satisfied with certain developments in our youth today, within or without the services.

However, I do want to say that I have studied this situation for many years. I have been for the last 7 years a member of the subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee that has charge of legislation concerning personnel. I have been an officer myself for more than 34 years. I am certain that we have far less criminal, immoral, or vicious action from members of the armed services than we do from the same age group out of the services. I have kept track of scores of soldiers who served under me in World War II and they have turned out well, and I am proud that I have known them.

LESS THAN 4 PERCENT OF THE RUSSIAN SOLDIERS REENLIST

It is interesting that less than 4 percent of the Russian enlistments are reenlistments. This means that 96 percent of the soldiers have had no previous military training. This clearly points out the fact that Russian soldiers cannot be adequately trained to handle the complex equipment and electronically controlled devices of the modern sophisticated weapons which many say that Russia has. We know that Russia does not encourage the soldier to serve beyond his original draft period. This plainly shows that the great mass of Russian servicemen cannot effectively man the modern equipment Russia is reputed to have, whereas we know the American serviceman is trained and equipped to use them. Incidentally, American servicemen daily demonstrate their ability to operate our modern equipment.

As to the relationship between the Russian soldier and his officer, compared to the same relationship in the American Army, in Russia the general, comparable to our major general, receives 156 times as much pay as the private. In the United States a major general receives 15 times as much as the private.

ARE OUR SERVICE RIVALRIES INJURING OUR DEFENSE EFFORTS?

There is, and always will be, rivalry between the various services as to which one shall assume responsibility for certain phases of our military efforts. That rivalry under proper control can work to our greater effectiveness, in places against us. Rivalry will exist within the service itself. As a tank battalion commander in World War II, I instinctively worked for the betterment of my unit as to equipment and its assignment to a key position. That same rivalry exists between the companies and on down to the squads.

This rivalry can do damage to our military effectiveness and greatly increase the cost to the taxpayer unless those who make the decisions make them honestly, courageously, and intelligently. The natural rivalry to excel is a part of the esprit de corps so necessary to any real fighting force. Rivalry to excel must not be stopped. We must see that the right decision is made, regardless of this natural rivalry.

THE CITIZEN SOLDIER IS STILL INDISPENSABLE TO OUR MILITARY STRENGTH

The Reserve component of our armed services has shown an equal increase in size and especially in efficiency. The present strength of our Reserve force is as follows:

National Guard	400,000
Army Reserve	300,000
Navy Reserve	145,000
Marine Corps Reserve	42,811
Air National Guard	74,500
Air Force Reserve	60,560

These Reserve components are better trained and equipped than they have ever been in our past history. I have always been especially interested in our Reserve forces, having been a commissioned officer in the Reserve or Guard, both active and inactive, for more than 34 years.

All of the National Guard division has been reorganized in the new, modern pentomic organization. This is also true of most of the Reserve division.

Our country has always relied upon the citizen soldier in time of war. This has been the case since the militia, the forerunner of the National Guard, fought the British Regulars at Concord and Lexington. The Colonial Militia even existed before the Revolution.

The citizen soldier is far better prepared than ever before.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE ABROAD

There has been considerable misunderstanding as to the job being done by American troops abroad. While we have combat troops in several countries, the greatest job we have been doing abroad has been in the supervision and training of local troops, and in assisting in furnishing equipment for these troops. This program should not be confused with our foreign-aid program, although they do, in many instances, dovetail each other. American troops abroad have assisted in building capable armed forces throughout the world. I have been very familiar with this program, and have visited at least once each training mission adjacent to the Bamboo and Iron Curtains. Every place I have been I found that American officers and men are doing a good job. I have found that America and Americans are respected and admired. While I have not favored all of our actions abroad, and I realize that dollars have been wasted, it is a fact that in no place where the United States has had military assistance groups did that country divert to communism. Some people quote Vietnam as such a case. To my knowledge, however, the United States only furnished equipment to Vietnam and was not allowed to assist in training the Vietnamese troops until after Dien Bien Phu fell, the French left, and American military assistance took over. Since that time, communism has not gained in South Vietnam, but on the contrary the area is definitely oriented to the West, although I admit that the cost has been great. America's military advice and training has inspired confidence in the military establishments of friendly countries throughout the world.

MILITARY COSTS TODAY AT BEST ARE HIGH

Today our defense costs are greatly increased because of the great and rapid changes in armament. For tens of centuries weapons of war were confined generally to the sword, spear and arrow. For about 400 years gunpowder was king. The military air age, generally begun in 1917, barely 42 years ago, now apparently is slowly phasing out. The nuclear bomb age commenced in 1945, 14 years ago; while the missile age commenced in Germany in 1945 and in Russia in 1946. Our country did not really start it until 6 years ago.

This rapid change places a terrific financial burden on the American taxpayer. It has added to the natural rivalry of the services—rivalry as to weapons and the type of war for which we should prepare. It has also created terrific pressure from the manufacturers of modern armaments to spend more for their product. If we were certain as to the type of war for which we should prepare, we would know the weapons that we should accentuate; but of this no one can be certain. Our most capable military leaders honestly disagree on this point. Allow me to quote some statements made by some of our military leaders at the hearings on this year's appropriations bill before the subcommittee on the Department of Defense appropriations. The subject was whether we were appropriating an excessive amount of our overall budget for a massive atomic retaliation as opposed to preparation for what is called conventional war. These discussions were found on pages 8, 9, and 10 of the committee report.

Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, Chief of Staff of the Army, says:

I consider that we have an excessive number of strategic weapons and weapons systems in the atomic retaliatory force. * * * In my judgment the aggregate is excessive to the requirements.

Adm. Arleigh Burke, Chief of Naval Operations, generally held the same views, saying:

I think there is a rate of building up retaliatory capability which is greater than that which is necessary. * * * I think we do have too much retaliatory power, and I think that we should put more money into limited capability.

Gen. Thomas S. Power, the Commander of the Strategic Air Command, took an entirely opposite view, saying:

I maintain that we have sufficient armed services to tailor a force to handle any small war.

It is easy to say that the only weapons that you need is a great supply of nuclear bombs with the ability to deliver them. Unquestionably such capability is important, but since the end of World War II there have been 24 "small" wars which have cost millions in casualties and billions in dollars, each under the shadow of the atom bomb, which was never used. In fact, undue reliance on the atom bomb might place us in a position where it would be ourselves who might have to make use of it. Today we are strong, very strong, not only in conventional military strength but also in the capability for massive retaliation. We should remain that way. Often the potential enemy picks war in such a place and manner that precludes the use of the weapons that you would desire to use. History is replete with such cases.

HAS THE ADMINISTRATION AND CONGRESS BEEN DESTROYING OUR MILITARY STRENGTH TO SAVE MONEY?

One of the most oft-repeated charges against the Administration and Congress is that they have allowed economy to injure our defense capabilities. That charge has been repeated so often and with such vehemence that I fear too many Americans are beginning to believe these charges are true.

In order to accurately understand whether these charges are true or false it is necessary to go back over a period of years to determine what our national trend is in preparedness and national defense. In order to properly arrive at the actual figures as to personnel strength and military expenditures over a period of the last 10 years, I have had the Legislative Reference Service at the Library of Congress prepare the figures on the actual facts, not what the propagandists are saying. I have taken the figures for the fiscal year immediately before the Korean war and then taken the figures for the first full fiscal year after the Korean war. In fairness I left out expenditures during the war, for during these years the expenditures were for war, not for defense.

As of June 30, 1949, there were 419,000 persons in the Air Force. This number had decreased to 411,000 by June 30, 1950, which was just as the Korean war commenced. Today the strength of the Air Force is 845,000 men.

The strength of the Army has increased from a total on June 30, 1950, of 632,000 to the present 870,000 men.

The manpower of the Navy on June 30, 1949, was 450,000 men. In June 1950, just as the Korean war started, it was 382,000. Today naval manpower stands at 630,000.

On June 30, 1949, Marine strength was 94,000. This figure was allowed to drop to 77,000 by June 30, 1950, just as the Korean war started. Today the Marine Corps strength is 170,000.

As to appropriations, which I will discuss next, an interesting fact is that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, just 6 days after the Korean war began, the Army had failed to spend 21 percent of its total appropriation. The following are the appropriations made by Congress for defense expenditures for 1949 through 1960, excepting 1951, 1952, and 1953, when the Korean war was in progress.

[Expenditures in millions of dollars]

1950	11,887
1954	40,336
1955	35,532
1956	35,791
1957	38,439
1958	39,062
1959 (preliminary)	41,217
1960 (estimated)	40,945

WE ARE LOWERING THE EXPENDITURES FOR MILITARY INSTALLATIONS WITHOUT ENDANGERING OUR SECURITY

I am pleased that we are able to cut our expenditures in the building of military installations. We are able to accomplish this without endangering our security because we have reached our peak in constructing the greatest complex of military installations at home and abroad that the world has ever known. The only manner in which we can intelligently construct our military installations is to have a definite long-range plan. I believe that we do have such a plan and that we have reached the peak of expenditures in this plan; now yearly expenditures can be gradually reduced.

In order to understand exactly the trend in military construction, I requested the Legislative Reference Service at the Library of Congress to provide the military construction figures for each of the last 7 years. They are as follows for the fiscal years of 1954 to 1960:

[Appropriations in millions of dollars]

1954	280
1955	847
1956	1,248
1957	1,463
1958	2,056
1959	1,404
1960	1,285

You will note that there was a rapid rise from $280 million for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1953, to the sum of $2,056 million. The following year we were able to cut the appropriation $600 million and this year we were able to cut it more than $119 million further. I hope that we can cut it substantially next year.

We have many hundreds of installations at home and abroad far better than similar installations of any country on earth. I am satisfied that we can continue to cut this appropriation without in any way reducing our defense capabilities.

WE CUT THE BUDGET REQUEST FOR ANTIAIRCRAFT DEFENSE WITHOUT ENDANGERING OUR SECURITY

For several years we have been apprehensive over possible attacks by bombers. We have built up Nike defenses around our large cities and key industrial areas. The Nike antiaircraft missile has been phenomenally accurate in bringing down robot planes at great distances and altitudes. We have been moving rapidly in the field of antiaircraft defense.

It had been proposed to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on the Bomarc, which was to be placed along our entire northern frontier and was to go out at greater distances than the Nike to destroy any incoming hostile bomber. Frankly, this project was relatively untried and we cut the amount of appropriations for Bomarc by $162 million from a proposed $400 million. I voted to cut it considerably more than that.

The fact is that the United States is far ahead of Russia on long-distance bombers and also on antiaircraft defense. So there is no danger of a Russian bomber attack unless she were courting massive disaster for herself. Whether Russia's shift from long-distance bombers demonstrates peaceful intentions or it foreshadows military moves in another direction remains to be seen. However, we must not spend extravagantly in a field in which we do not face attack. In this changing world we must be able to meet every threat, but it is no less than criminal stupidity to spend money or resources that are not needed.

WILL THERE BE WAR?

I do not believe that war faces us in the near future, but no one can know of a certainty that there will be no war. An adversary might deliberately plan a military attack. If a country is determined to do this, which I greatly doubt, there is nothing we can do but be ready to resist force with force. If our adversary lives only by force, the stronger we are militarily the less likely it is that a nation will deliberately attack us. That philosophy is axiomatic. However, there remains a great danger of war if a country believes it can, by intimidation and gradual encroachment, gain her objectives without war. For instance, if Germany, just before World War I, and Japan, prior to World War II, had been fully aware that the United States would have entered those wars and fought them through to the end with the economic, military, and spiritual strength we possessed, neither Germany nor Japan would have caused her entry into these wars. We all hope that Premier Khrushchev will take back to Russia a clearer understanding of this Nation's great strength, our determination to remain free, and our dedication to the dignity of the individual.

The United States must make its stand firm and clear. We must make our intentions clear so that no country will erroneously think that it can, with immunity, commit any act of aggression which may start a chain of events that would result in war. We have handled the Berlin situation very well—we have let Russia know exactly how far she can go. Returning from Berlin recently I made the following observations:

Yes; Berlin is a brightly lighted show window where all can see by comparison the shoddiness and drabness of the regimented way of life that is communism which is causing the great crisis in Berlin today. Russia feels that she can no longer afford to permit this demonstration of communism's failure—that she must extinguish the lights in this show window.

I have talked with Germans—soldiers, businessmen, shopkeepers, taxi drivers, and government officials, including Willy Brandt, mayor of West Berlin. I have talked with students, German and American. No place have I found fear. I have talked with dependents of American military personnel. There is no panic, only the firm conviction that we must cling to that which is right.

Will there be war? No one knows of a certainty. America's awareness has changed since Potsdam. Freedom has stood up to communism. Two factors could cause a war. If Russia decides to start a war, there is nothing we can do to stop her, because she would find a time, a place and a reason of her own choosing. Our deterrent then is to let Russia know that we have such strength that any war she starts will be unprofitable to her. We certainly have that strength.

The other factor that could cause a war would be that Russia, continuing down that path of threats, maneuvers, and bluffing that she hopes will gain her goal of world domination, might inadvertently stumble into the fatal step that would cause war.

So it is up to us to keep that path brilliantly lighted and crystal clear, with a firm, fair, well-defined policy so that Russia will not stumble into a war through miscalculation, but will know just how far she can go—and that that step is just short of West Berlin.

FUTURE MILITARY DEVELOPMENTS

When President Eisenhower meets with Premier Khrushchev he will be able to talk from strength, for our impressive military preparation backs up his position. We must maintain this posture of strength for the foreseeable future.

Our military development is progressing so rapidly that it is difficult to plan for the future. We have just abandoned the Navy Seamaster plane, on which we have spent more than $400 million. This is unfortunate, but it has become clear that there are other developments which are more important. We should have made that decision earlier. I opposed authorization for expenditures for bases for the Seamaster last year. We did succeed in cutting the authorization at that time, but failed to get it completely eliminated.

An interesting example of the rapid development in armaments that we are experiencing today and the problems it creates is the recent cancellation of our liquid boron fuel project after we had spent $240 million in research and development. In order to obtain a fuel for airplanes that would provide more power per pound of fuel, thereby increasing the operating distance of our planes, a program of research was undertaken to develop liquid boron fuels. After $240 million was spent for installations to manufacture this fuel and for research, it was determined that future developments in this field were not worth the cost. The reason for this decision was that research proved that our future B–70 bomber, one of the planes for for which this new exotic fuel was intended, could, by refinements and improvements, operate for its needed distance on regular jet fuel—kerosene. The project of the naval missile Regulus II, which needed such a fuel, was canceled because the newer and better Navy Polaris ballistic missile was near completion. The Bomarc, the Air Force antiaircraft missile which could have used this powerful and exotic fuel, was found not to be necessary in the numbers previously anticipated. These facts, together with the fact that as yet we could only produce liquid boron fuel for $35 per gallon in comparison with kerosene at 12 cents a gallon, caused us to stop the liquid boron fuel project before we had spent any more money. Perhaps the mistake we made was in not stopping the project earlier. We did, however, learn much that may be of use to us in the future.

Yes, this was very expensive, but we learned, and the path to military success has always been expensive, especially today. Perhaps we should never have commenced this expensive project. But before we commenced it, we could not have known the results.

It is interesting to recall that after Russia launched sputnik in 1957 we heard on every hand that they had discovered some new fuel that would revolutionize the world. We later found that she used kerosene as a fuel and liquid oxygen as an oxidizer, the same as we use.

Recently we have bypassed and stopped development on several planes because we were able to see a still better plane just ahead of us on the drawing board.

The same is true of missiles. In a short time the Sergeant and the Pershing, both solid propellant missiles, will replace the Corporal, the 80-mile, and the Redstone, the 150-mile, ballistic missiles now with the Army troops at home and abroad. These missiles will be far superior to those they are replacing. The 1,500-mile ballistic missiles Jupiter and Thor are now in the hands of Air Force troops at home and abroad, and improvements in these missiles are under way. The 5,500-mile Atlas, after several discouraging tests, has now made three successful firings in a row of more than 5,000 miles. The Titan missile of the same range and thought to be superior should be in operation within the year and should be followed by the Minuteman in the near future, which is a 5,500-mile solid propellant ballistic missile.

The Air Force also has missiles which are fired from planes at enemy planes with phenomenal accuracy in operation. The Air Force is now also able to fire a nuclear missile from their planes to a target several hundred miles away on the ground. Their planes are the best on earth.

The Army is today the most mobile army on earth. Modern equipment and specialized training enables it to rapidly move troops by land, air, or water. The new pentomic structure enables it to operate effectively in conventional or atomic war. Its antiaircraft defense is the best.

The Navy in addition to its conventional ships and aircraft carriers has been the pioneer in atomic submarines. Almost 5 years ago I spent a night on the Nautilus and its performance was phenomenal. The Navy is now working on missiles that work entirely under water; those that go from water to air; from water to air to surface; from water to air to under water; and missiles to intercept and destroy other underwater missiles. While Russia probably has more submarines than the United States, we are far ahead in quality and capabilities.

It would take volumes to narrate the progress that we are making militarily and our drawing board plans for all branches of our services. But I do want to point out that our military strength is such that now or in the foreseeable future no country, unless ruled by a madman, would deliberately attack us. That is all that we can do. We cannot control the sanity of rulers of other countries.

WE ARE ATTEMPTING TO CORRECT EVILS EXPOSED IN RECENT HEARINGS REGARDING EXCESSIVE PROFITS AND POSSIBLE UNFAIR INFLUENCE IN OBTAINING DEFENSE CONTRACTS

There has been considerable adverse publicity concerning excessive profits by defense contractors and of possible undue influence of retired generals and admirals and former high civilian officials from the Departments of Army, Navy, and Air. The conditions surrounding defense expenditures make these problems very difficult to cope with. Frankly, I am disappointed in the selfishness and unfairness demonstrated by certain corporations and individuals. It is very difficult to let these contracts on a purely competitive bidding as you could if the bid were being made on a staple product that is being made by more than one manufacturer. The product is often a plane or missile which not only has never been produced, but is only on a drawing board in a vague sort of way. It is difficult to avoid favoritism in the letting of such a contract and it is still more difficult to bargain as to price, for neither the Government nor the maker can know the eventual cost. The armament race is so fast and strenuous that often the plan of today is changed many times before tomorrow or may be totally abandoned for something newer and better before the first model is even finished.

As for retired generals and admirals, the specialized training and experience of these gentlemen is often greatly needed by the defense contractors. On the other hand, a defense contractor may employ a retired officer purely for his influence. These problems are very real and are arousing just criticism. I am especially concerned about these problems because I was recently appointed to a special subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee to—make full and complete studies of the procurement policies and practices of the Department of Defense, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Air Force, and the Department of the Navy. Such studies are to include an examination of the experience of such Departments in the use of various methods of procurement and types of contractual instruments, with particular regard to the effectiveness thereof in achieving reasonable costs, prices, and profits.

The results of such studies, together with recommendations as may be deemed necessary or desirable, are to be reported by the named committee to their respective Houses not later than September 30, 1960. It is also provided that the material and data collected in the course of such studies be made available to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to assist it in making the study of renegotiation required by subsection (b) of section 4.

I am well aware of my responsibility in making such a study.

WILL ACCOMPLISHMENTS IN SPACE TRAVEL MAKE US STRONGER MILITARILY?

Since Russia fired their first sputnik in October 1957, there has been an increasingly great clamor that America spend limitless billions on mastering space. Many attach great military significance to space travel and you often hear that it would mean military control of the world. I do not claim to have a crystal ball that will tell the future, but even a casual study of the problems of space travel raises many doubts as to its military effectiveness. Just a few days ago, Dr. Albert R. Hibbs, a member of the Lunar Exploration Committee formed by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, speaking in Los Angeles before the Fourth Annual Symposium on Ballistic Missile and Space Technology, warned the United States not to be fooled by military adventures on the moon or other planets.

Such proposals appear to be no more than childish and transparent attempts to frighten the public and their Congressmen into continued appropriations for space programs at which they may be inclined to take a second look.

Dr. Hibbs went further and said that the main driving force in space research should be man's curiosity about the cosmos, not international competition.

Dr. Hibbs also commented on the NASA program to develop moon robots for exploring the lunar surface, "It is quite doubtful that the Nation will benefit much from the military applications of this phase of the space program."

Working and planning for space travel may be exciting and romantic, it may be educational and useful. It certainly is expensive. However, unless the placing of American troops on the moon may assist our defense efforts, we should not spend defense money for that purpose. If we want to excel in space projects, and the American people want the Government to spend their tax money for such purposes, that is understandable. But let us not call it national defense when its primary objectives are not related to defense.

Perhaps one of the greatest threats that the United States faces is that we, by foolish spending and following glamorous will-o'-the-wisps of fantastic, extravagant spending, will wreck America.

WHAT IS OUR COUNTRY'S MILITARY GOAL?

Our country has been most fortunate, for which we should be deeply appreciative. Our standards of living and way of life are far higher than any other on earth. We are strong and becoming stronger; we desire to take no territory from any country or people; we only desire to help where we can.

Our job is to look after America, not "ape" everything Russia may do. Our program must be positive and designed to meet America's needs and philosophy of freedom. Our military strength must not ebb and flow as Russia smiles or frowns. Admiral Rickover made a statement recently about keeping up with Russia which is very appropriate to repeat here. He said that if we were to learn one night that the Russians had a program to send a man to hell, by the next morning three or four Government agencies would send to Congress plans and budget requests for a similar program with the excuse that we cannot let the Russians get there first.

In America we must realize that regardless of our strength—economic and military—we cannot correct all the wrongs in the world. If we used American wealth and military might to build the world as we would have it, to care for all the world and to militarily correct every wrong, we eventually would destroy our own freedom. The armaments necessary for such a global plan would break the back of the American taxpayer and would destroy the very things we would try to give to or force upon all other peoples.

No one knows exactly what course we should follow militarily, what weapons we should accentuate, what special goals in research and development should guide our military plans. A nation's future militarily is always cloudy. No one knows what action, if any, the potential enemy will take. I, for one, do not believe we are faced with war, but I may be wrong and I cannot take the chance of unpreparedness—too much is at stake. The parlor pinks and our un-American fringe deprecate our country's efforts for obvious reasons. Some armament salesmen deprecate our strength in an effort to sell us their gadgets and missiles. Others have personal or political reasons to disparage American greatness. But in spite of those who would belittle us, America has achieved a way of life that is really strong, and throughout the world America is still the "real McCoy." All the people of the world want the same things we have in America. America is strong, the strongest country, economically and militarily, on earth. But that strength must not cause us to be arrogant. On the contrary, that strength should cause us to be grateful and humble, and eternally dedicated to preserving that most priceless heritage of America, the freedom and dignity of the individual.

I realize that most of my remarks have been directed to our military strength, and I so intended it that way. However, it is most important that we keep foremost in our minds the fact that the real strength in America is not armed might—our Army, Navy, and planes, the atom bomb—but our real strength is our free unregimented people, a nation under God, where the freedom and dignity of the individual is supreme. Without that freedom and dignity that has produced the greatest economy on earth, and our great spiritual strength, our military strength would be but ashes.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO LOWER THE VOTING AGE TO 18

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, after considerable thought and as a result of some practical experience this summer, I have decided to sponsor a constitutional amendment to lower the voting age to 18. I am convinced that passage of such an amendment would strengthen the processes of democracy.

For the past 12 weeks I have sponsored a summer program in my congressional office which has enabled scores of high-school and college students to learn the inner workings of the legislative process. This summer I have had students from the following colleges in my office: Wellesley, Williams, Swarthmore, Cornell, University of North Carolina, Northwestern, and, last but not least in beauty and brains, Stephens College, of Columbia, Mo.

In addition, I have sponsored a contest in the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia for all high school juniors, the prize for which has been for 1 boy and 1 girl from each of the 10 counties in my district to work for 1 week in my Washington office. This high school program has been richly rewarding, both to the students and to the efficiency, output, and enthusiastic spirit in my office.

In the early spring I announced the terms of this contest in letters to high school principals and social-studies teachers, and enlisted their cooperation. I made talks at a number of the schools, outlining the rules and what the winners might expect when they came to Washington. We devised application blanks and announcements to distribute and post on school bulletin boards. We required each applicant to submit a complete statement of academic record, interests, and extracurricular activities, along with requiring a one-page essay on "Why I Would Like To Work in My Congressman's Office."

Once the applications were in, they were judged in each county by a nonpartisan board of three to five judges, including a newspaper editor, minister, and educator or businessman. They were judged on the basis of character, academic and extracurricular record, and the excellence of the essay. The judges selected the outstanding high-school boy and high-school girl in each county, with two alternates.

We then worked out a schedule for the boys and girls to come to Washington.

I sent them each a round-trip coach ticket, which could frequently be secured at excursion rates. We arranged for two boys to come one week, two girls the next week, and alternated them in this way all summer. Although this meant that students from different counties came the same week, the problems of housing, associations, and breaking the ice in a strange town were made easier. We secured the excellent cooperation of the West Virginia State Society whose members took in the students rent-free in their homes for a week at a time. I then gave each student $20 for food and travel during the week.

The entire program cost me $1,200 for the summer, all of which came out of my salary. The college students, most of which served free "internships" with me during the summer, helped supervise the program. Walter Carter, a student who had just finished his freshman year at Swarthmore, was on my payroll at a nominal salary to meet the students at the train, help them get oriented, and point out the most useful and interesting ways they could spend their evenings in the Nation's Capital.

What could these high school students do? Every morning at 8:30 we had a staff meeting at which I would outline the hot current issues cropping up in the mail, the witnesses to testify at the hearings of my Committee on Science and Astronautics, the bills to be debated or voted on at the daily session of the House, and the visitors likely to come into the office. Each morning I would also review the past day's work and stir the students to raise questions or offer suggestions. At the close of the staff meeting I would assign the work for the day, making sure the high school students had specific assignments.

They would start out with something requiring no previous training, such as clipping the hometown papers and keeping our scrapbook up to date. From this point they quickly graduated to typing letters, answering the telephone, operating the mimeograph machine, receiving visitors, helping guide visitors around the Capitol, securing copies of bills and Government documents, handling requests for agricultural bulletins and yearbooks, sending copies of "Infant Care" to new parents, reading and marking the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for key items, and undertaking small research projects on issues. Their enthusiasm and imaginative spirit gave a lift to the entire office force.

Frequently, I would bring Members of the House and Senate to our morning staff meeting or to a session later in the day, to engage in question-and-answer sessions on current issues. Each week the two high school students would film a brief interview with some leading personality. Guests at these sessions included Members from both sides of the aisle, including Senators STUART SYMINGTON, FRANK CHURCH, BARRY GOLDWATER, JOHN KENNEDY, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, and ROBERT BYRD, and Representatives AL ULLMAN, JAMES O'HARA, STEWART UDALL, JOHN BRADEMAS, JAMES FULTON, JOHN LINDSAY, DAVID KING, WALTER MOELLER, STANLEY PROKOP, RALPH RIVERS, DANIEL INOUYE, and many others.

The students all wrote to me after they had returned home. One note seemed to crop up in all their letters. They had not realized that Congress was such a complex institution or that a Member had so many heavy responsibilities. They did not realize that a Member must study the background of issues, weave together the local and the national interest, and conscientiously work, through parliamentary procedure, toward the most acceptable solution. All of the students went away with a higher respect for Congress as an institution, and the Members, as individuals, with the exception of the low attendance of Members on the floor. The week here heightened their patriotism and faith in democracy.

I learned many things from the students. For my part, I learned the importance of clarity and simplicity of explanation. On the part of the students, I learned that frequently the mere lack of experience can be compensated for by enthusiasm, drive, and willingness to learn.

But above all, I concluded after this summer's experience that the average young person is sufficiently alert and mature politically to vote at the age of 18. We have often heard the argument that a person old enough to fight should be old enough to vote; that if young people can get married and get automobile driver's licenses at 18, they should be old enough to vote. But I would like to direct attention to an even more important argument. The first great stirring of intellectual interest in public affairs takes place in high school, both as a result of social studies courses and participation in student elections, Hi-Y, Boys' State, and other activities. Dampen that interest by postponing voting responsibility until age 21 and you are dulling the edge of their interest in civic affairs. How many students we have seen who have entered college with a keen interest in politics, which has been diverted into social or other channels by the lack of the power to cast a vote.

At the time when the voting age was set at 21, our school system was vastly inferior. Boys and girls only went to school a few months during the year. Now they become educated faster and should be allowed to assume their civic responsibilities faster. Georgia and Kentucky already have lowered the voting age to 18, with good results. I am convinced that passage of this constitutional amendment will not only stir a greater interest in public affairs, but will inject a new note of idealism into our politics at all levels. Youth is the age of idealism, unfettered by personal, selfish or economic group interest. America's youth, the hope of the future, must be served in order to strengthen the Nation. Let us place our faith in America's greatest natural resource—our young people—and allow them to vote when they have reached political maturity at the age of 18.

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE START OF WORLD WAR II

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 20th anniversary of the most brutal war ever visited upon civilization.

It was 20 years ago today that the Nazi Wehrmacht and Stukas stormed into Poland and touched off a war that ultimately resulted in the death of millions of people, including our own American soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen.

I think it is fitting that we here in Congress today pause long enough to recall the incidents which led to this holocaust and what lessons the people of the free world can learn from that tragic experience. It is indeed depressing, in the light of today's events, that the world has learned relatively little from our horrifying experience in World War II. We see today the identical techniques used by Hitler and Stalin, the architects of World War II, being repeated; and yet, the free world seems almost helpless in avoiding a third world war.

The same spirit of bewilderment and lack of understanding by those representing the free world is manifest today just as it was 20 years ago, when the protectors of freedom yielded to expediency in the naive belief that they could avoid World War II.

We need only cite the invitation of Premier Khrushchev to this country at a time when his Communist puppets are pushing the buttons in Moscow to enslave Laos and are brazenly warning the free West of total destruction if it refuses to yield on Berlin. This is the same Khrushchev who was military and administrative head of the Soviet occupation forces in the eastern part of Poland which was seized almost simultaneously with Hitler's invasion of Poland 20 years ago today. It was under Khrushchev's direction that some 2 million Poles, mostly women and children, were deported to slave labor camps in Siberia. It was also under his administration in eastern Poland that 15,000 Polish Army officers were taken to Katyn and massacred.

In retrospect, we need only review the hysterical boasts of Hitler and compare them to the irresponsible outcries of Khrushchev to see what an alarming parallel exists between 1939 and 1959. Tragically, through their huge propaganda apparatus, the Communists slowly are forcing upon the world the philosophy of peace at any price, when actually behind these hypocritical Communist outcries for peace lies the most diabolical conspiracy ever to confront civilization. It is alarming that in the few years since World War II has ended, international communism has made gains in 72 nations of the world.

How quickly the world has forgotten the great price we all paid in the struggle for freedom from 1939 to 1945. The brutality of the Nazis at Dachau and Buchenwald had been equaled only by the barbaric acts of the Communists at Katyn and Siberia.

I have said here before, and I will continue to say, that this memorial to the gallant people who gave their lives in World War II so that freedom might triumph over tyranny, must serve with the same force as an indictment against the Soviet rulers as against the Nazi rulers. There can be no question in anyone's mind that World War II was engineered just as brazenly by the rulers of Moscow as it was by Hitler when the Soviet Union agreed to its infamous Ribbentrop-Molotov Nonaggression Pact with Germany only 7 days before Hitler's troops stormed into Poland.

Today, as we recall this tragic anniversary, I firmly believe that those of us who want to preserve freedom for posterity must face up to the reality that a broad formula for peace must be found by mankind, a formula which will be based on the rule of international law enforced by economic sanctions.

As we study the tragic events which led up to the final outburst of war in Europe on September 1, 1939, we will see that this entire holocaust perhaps could have been avoided if free people had heeded the sober warnings of President Roosevelt as early as 1937 and had given him the authority to impose economic sanctions aginst those who at that time threatened the peace of the world.

I am convinced that had Mr. Roosevelt been permitted to move forcefully when he saw the dark clouds of war sweeping across the horizons of Europe, Poland, one of America's traditional allies, would today be free. The other satellite nations, being held captive by the Communist conspiracy, would also be able to enjoy the luxury of freedom, and the millions who fell victims of World War II would still be with us.

I shall, Mr. Speaker, review the tragic events which led to this unnecessary war; but before I do that, I think it is incumbent upon us here in Congress to impress as strongly as we can on those who today control our foreign policy that appeasement is not the road to peace. History will demonstrate that whenever the free people of the world had the courage to remain firm and resolute in their dedication to freedom, tyrants and dictators have fallen from the weight of their own oppression. I fear that those who are today guiding America's destiny in international diplomacy are too quick to bargain with the despots of Moscow. Such policy can end only in disaster for America and the free world.

We have given hardly more than lip service to the principle that there can be no peace in Europe so long as the heroic nations of central Europe, including Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Czechoslovakia, remain in Communist hands. I have said repeatedly that there is a great deal more strength and vigor in defending a right rather than bemoaning a wrong. Tragically, it appears that those in this country who quake and quiver in the wake of every boast made by the Soviet rulers, regardless of how irresponsible such boasts may be, are actually sowing the seeds of destruction for America.

I am sure that there is nothing the American people want more than peace, and as one who had participated in the horrifying bombings of Japan during World War II, and personally witnessed the havoc that war can bring upon millions of people, I too want peace.

I think the time has come when the United States should lead the way in a bold and firm program under which we should strengthen the International World Court at The Hague as an effective tribunal for settling international disputes. We should marshal the support of all nations to enforce the decrees of the International World Court through economic sanctions. It will mean that all nations of the world will have to prepare themselves for great economic sacrifices if necessary, but at least under this concept, the logic of law will replace the devastation of bombs.

I am not at all in agreement with those who insist that the Connelly amendment must be repealed before we can make the International Court an effective instrument for adjudicating international disputes. As an American, I think there is merit to the concern of those who feel the International Court should deal only in matters affecting prima facie international disputes. As we study the prelude to World War II, we can see how often the brush fires could have been extinguished if an effective International Court had been in existence prior to the great conflagration.

More important, the disastrous conspiracy of international communism could today be contained and reversed if even at this late date we resolved to establish the International Court as an effective tribunal.

There should be no question in anyone's mind that the Soviet Union is intent on destroying capitalism as a free institution through the Communists' mounting economic competition made possible only through the use of slave labor. While the Communists brazenly boast of their war potential, it is significant to me that their biggest drive today is for economic gains. I am convinced that we can win the great struggle by challenging them with economic sanctions in every area where they would disrupt the peace of the world. This is the only language the Soviet rulers will understand.

Determined action in this direction would indeed attract and capture the imagination of the vast majority of those uncommitted nations which today do not know which way to turn in this great geopolitical struggle. Too long has the free world tried to attract these uncommitted nations, which today may well constitute the balance of power in this world, by attempting to force them into military alliances instead of economic alliances.

The United States itself has led the way in establishing a whole series of regional military alliances, such as NATO and SEATO. Has not the time come when we should approach this entire problem now along economic lines?

Poland was the first victim of Hitler's armed aggression. Her heroic struggle for survival against overwhelming odds served as an inspiration to the rest of the world, which eventually was drawn into the great conflict.

But this barbaric invasion of Poland was the culmination of a long series of incidents which preceded World War II. So we can better understand the anatomy of this great conflict, I should like to call your attention to six important events which constituted the prelude to World War II. I cite these six important events because they demonstrate so graphically how the seeds of war have a slow process of germination, stretching over a period of years. Substitute what is going on in Laos or India, or Quemoy or Berlin today, and you have a terrifying parallel to the events which preceded World War II.

Hitler plowed his armies into Poland and massacred several million people because he insisted that the city of Danzig and the Polish Corridor must be reunited to the Third Reich. But six signposts had earlier pointed to World War II: Manchuria, Ethiopia, the Rhineland, the Spanish Civil War, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. Each one of these six signposts convinced Hitler more and more that he could pursue his conquests without real interference either from Britain or France and that he could safely ignore the United States and the rest of the world.

Each of these signposts demonstrated how badly the world powers were divided and how reluctant they were to act in time. Manchuria was the first victim of aggression in September 1931. This aggression began with the Mukden incident at Marco Polo Bridge, when a section of track of the South Manchurian Railway was blown up. There was sufficient evidence that this incident was touched off by the Japanese, who eventually took over Manchuria.

Too many of us have forgotten that China appealed to the League of Nations. Japan's reply was withdrawal from the league, and when U.S. Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson called for collective action to stop this first overt act of aggression which threatened the peace of the world, his plea fell on deaf ears because no world power was prepared to act.

Four months after the Mukden incident, Japanese troops, with apparent impunity, landed at Shanghai and touched off their piecemeal war, which remained undeclared until 1941.

I should like to point out here that this technique of undeclared war was repeated by Hitler on September 1, 1939, when his troops stormed into Poland with no formal declaration of war. Hitler, who came to power in 1933 through the support of street rowdies and power-drunk storm troopers, learned his lessons well from a world that was unwilling to face reality toward the Japanese aggression in 1931. Hitler was quick to realize how successfully Japan had challenged the League of Nations, and he capitalized on his firm belief that the league was impotent when only mild protests were registered against the invasion of Ethiopia in 1935. Here again the free world had an opportunity to mobilize its economic powers and stop the aggression in Ethiopia, but as in the past, the opportunity fell to expediency and appeasement.

Here was another lesson which was not lost to Hitler, and in March of 1936, his goose-stepping soldiers entered the Rhineland. Just as France had failed to support Britain in trying to stop the aggression in Ethiopia, now the tables were turned, and Britain's Stanley Baldwin failed to support France, whose troops were mobilized along the German frontier but did not act against the Nazi invasion of the Rhineland.

There is ample proof in documents uncovered after the fall of Germany that Hitler was prepared to evacuate the Rhineland in 1936 if the French troops had moved in. Again, the world had failed to face reality when World War II could have been avoided. We have a right to inquire whether Khrushchev is waging the same kind of bluff regarding Berlin today.

Just as the Berlin Treaty is being brazenly torpedoed today by Khrushchev, so was the Lucarno Pact, which guaranteed the Rhineland as a demilitarized zone by the Versailles Treaty, violated by Hitler in 1936. Can anyone challenge the statement today that this eerie parallel gives us all reason for sober reflection?

As if these guideposts were not enough to warn the world that it was heading for all-out war, the Spanish Civil War, started in 1936, should have served as the final eye-opener, for while it started innocently enough as a rights revolt against a popular front government, the Civil War in Spain soon developed into an international testing ground for World War II. Hitler's dive-bombing Stukas and other weapons were tried out there, and both the forces of the Nazi Fascist Axis and of international communism became deeply involved.

Significantly, this conflict ended in 1939, only 5 months before the beginning of World War II; and Hitler, now certain that he perfected armed aggression to a science, was ready.

Tragically, during the prelude to World War II which was going on in Spain, in 1938 Nazi stormtroopers staged their famous Anschluss of Austria. It was cunningly executed, and Austrian Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg was forced to resign. Hitler's Trojan horse, the Austrian Nazis, feverishly welcomed him when he flew to Vienna to receive their frenzied "heils."

And still the world naively looked on, as if hypnotized by Hitler's bold aggression.

The final setting for World War II was staged by Hitler in Czechoslovakia, when a German minority in the Czechoslovak Sudetenland drummed up phony charges of persecution. Hitler, now completely drunk with victory and power, demanded the surrender of the Sudetenland. It shall remain as an indelible mark upon the conscience of France and Britain, where Hitler's frenzied threats in defense of the Sudeten Germans found sympathy. Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain naively believed in appeasing Hitler by granting his demands. The result is now tragic history. The Munich Agreement, signed on September 30, 1938, which called on Czechoslovak President Eduard Benes to yield the border areas, has become a symbol of appeasement.

How hollow today ring the words of Chamberlain when he hailed the agreement as a guarantee of "peace in our time," especially when we recall that on March 14, 1939, 6 months after the Munich Agreement was signed, Benes' successor, President Emil Hacha, was summoned to Berlin and threatened with destruction of Prague by air if he did not agree to surrender Czechoslovakia as a protectorate of Germany.

Through all this, the Soviet Union engaged in its own treachery, playing off the East against the West, and while leading Britain and France into believing that it wanted a nonaggression treaty with the Western Powers, actually was negotiating secretly with Hitler for a pact which would cut up central Europe into spheres of influence between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. The free world realized only after the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact was announced that the time for appeasement had ended; but unfortunately and tragically, the discovery was made too late.

Hitler, assured of a free hand in dealing with his territorial demands on Poland because the Soviet Union had guaranteed him the "hands off" policy for 10 years, prepared to move swiftly. The belated treaty that Britain and France hastily executed with Poland came within hours of Hitler's monstrous attack on the Polish people.

The tragedy visited on the Poles and the rest of the world in that horrible war is now known only too well. But I have cited the prologue to World War II in the hope that dedicated men will soberly realize that what happened during those tragic years preceding World War II is again being repeated today. Instead of the devastating stukas and Messerschmitts and the eerie and destructive V–2 rockets which almost brought England to her knees, today the world is faced with nuclear destruction.

Harrowing as the prospects may be, history teaches us that freedom cannot survive where leadership and determination give way to appeasement and expediency. I hope that from the lessons of World War II, those of us who are still today able to breathe the air of freedom will be resolute in our search for a just peace.

I do not believe, and never have believed, that war is the only alternative to peace. I am firm in my belief that we, as a free people, can indeed find a road to lasting peace if the free world will recognize the tremendous potential in economic sanctions. That is why I have urged so strongly that we approach with all our vigor on a bold plane to strengthen the World Court. To those who say, how can this be done, let the free world today resolve that if the Soviet Union refuses to agree to a concept of international law for settling international disputes, these sanctions be applied until such time as Khrushchev and his Kremlin cohorts realize that the world is firm in this approach.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the subject I have discussed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago today the European continent went to war. The invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939, resulted in one of the worst holocausts in the history of mankind. Thousands upon thousands of innocent people lost their lives. The world would do well to reflect on this great tragedy. We all remember the statesmen of that day, Neville Chamberlain of Great Britain and Edward Daladier of France and we remember only too well the failure of their policy with regard to the containment of Nazi Germany. One word summarizes their action and that word is "appeasement." The word "appeasement" or "to appease" has two specific meanings relevant to international politics. According to the first definition, to appease means "to bring to a state of peace, quiet, ease or content" and according to the second, "to accede to the belligerent demands of a country, government, and so forth, by a sacrifice of justice." Between both definitions, however, lies a massive gap of difference. No one will quarrel with the assertion that the art of diplomacy, to be successfully employed, requires reconciling conflicts of interests, pacifying a vengeful enemy, and exercising unwarranted suspicions and fears among nations. This is a vital part of diplomatic practice. It is, in a sense, a lubricant for the machinery of international society.

However, the second definition of appeasement, "to accede to the belligerent demands of a country, government, and so forth, by a sacrifice of justice" is quite another matter. Indeed both definitions are contradictory in that by indulging in appeasement of the second order no nation could ever enjoy peace, quiet, and contentment. Appeasement of this sort is a lethal drug: it encourages weakness; it is an abdication of national will; it is, in short, an invitation to national disaster.

What makes appeasement a policy of self-destruction is the fact that it seeks to meet the threat of imperialism with methods that can only be acceptable and appropriate to a policy of the status quo. Imperialism cannot be dealt with as if it were a policy of the status quo which appeasement tries to do mainly because imperialism seeks to change the status quo and change it to its own advantage. Appeasement is, in fact, a corrupted policy of compromise whereby the imperialist nation, at the expense of the appeaser, seeks to rearrange the distribution of world power to his advantage. It is a policy aimed at the gradual erosion of power of the appeaser but carried on in such a clever way as to give the illusion that the imperialist power really wants to maintain the existing status quo. The error of the appeaser lies in the fact that he does not see that the successive demands of the imperialist, not at all being self-contained and issuing from specific grievances, are only the links of a chain that leads to the final overthrow of the status quo the appeaser seeks to maintain.

Hitlerian Germany is a classic case of appeasement used as a weapon to overthrow the European system established at Versailles by the victorious Allies. Britain and France acceded to Hitler's demands, beginning in 1935, with his repudiation of the disarmament provisions of Versailles. Reoccupation and remilitarization of the Rhineland took place on March 7, 1936, annexation of Austria took place on March 11, 1938, and the settlement at Munich ceding Sudetenland to Germany took place on September 30, 1938. Only when Hitler destroyed Czechoslovakia on March 15, 1939, and Germany forced Lithuania to cede the city of Memel to Germany on March 23, 1939, and invaded Poland on September 1, 1939, did France and England realize that Hitler, far from accepting the Versailles system, was actually pursuing a policy of imperialism, an imperialism with continental dimensions, did, on September 3, 1939, declare war on Germany. By that time, however, the bitter fruits of appeasement had created an uneven distribution of power in Europe, with the result that Hitlerian Germany now sought to overthrow the status quo of the interwar period and recreate Europe in the Nazi image.

Appeasement of the 1930's has a serious lesson for all of us today. Viewing the course of international relations during the past year, it is clear that Soviet Russia is trying to force us into playing the same appeasing role in our relations with her as France and England were forced to play against Hitlerian Germany. The Berlin crisis and the diplomatic events that have emerged from this crisis have a profound meaning for all of us. It is profound because in this crisis, artificially fabricated in Moscow, Khrushchev has thrown down a challenge to us. Khrushchev has asserted his intention of overthrowing what has come to be accepted as a status quo in Berlin—at least until Germany can be united—as a public demonstration of his belief that the world balance of forces has shifted in the favor of the U.S.S.R. He has tried to intimidate us: He has tried to compel us to resort to appeasing him as an only alternative policy to war. This is the start of an imperialist attack which, if acquiesced in through appeasement, could inevitably lead to Soviet control over the European Continent.

Appeasement is no viable policy: It is, I repeat, an invitation to national disaster. Other alternative policies are available to us, and they are all predicated upon the need for strength and self-assurance, determination, and resolution.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, it was just 20 years ago today, in the early hours about dawn, that Hitler unleashed the terrible and deadly might of his Panzer divisions in a blitzkrieg against peaceful Poland and Stuka dive bombers began pummeling magnificent Warsaw into blood and ruins.

The world was shocked by Hitler's act of waging undeclared war upon the Polish people. For the Poles it was a day of infamy. For the rest of the world it was a day that will be long remembered, for it marked the beginning of a tragic error, Hitler's dreams of conquering the world.

Hitler was not the only man with dreams of world conquest on September 1, 1939. He had an adversary by the name of Stalin, who on paper was Hitler's ally on that fateful morning. The leader of world communism also helped to carve up Poland by prearrangement, for on August 23, 1939, Stalin and Hitler set the stage for the demise of a free Poland by signing a nonaggression pact. While the courageous Poles were trying to defend themselves and their nation against overwhelming Nazi forces in the west, Stalin's Soviet Army thrust a dagger into the back of Poland on September 17 with an invasion from the east.

Our distinguished colleague from Michigan, Congressman MACHROWICZ, who is now in Warsaw as a U.S. delegate to the Interparliamentary Union Conference, last Thursday in a speech in his native Polish tongue reminded the Polish people, and Communist delegates to the conference, of Stalin's treachery. He received worldwide acclaim by the delegates of the free nations of the world to the Interparliamentary Union Conference for his candor, and press reports of Congressman MACHROWICZ' speech revealed that Communist delegates from the Soviet Union were very disturbed. Congressman MACHROWICZ, who fought in the Polish Army in World War I, is a native of Poznan, Poland, where patriotic citizens rose up and successfully staged demonstrations against the oppression of their Communist conquerors in October 1956. As a result of the uprisings the Polish people won a measure of economic and religious freedom from the Gomulka government and the Soviets in Moscow.

The Poznan rioting was only one of the long chain of demonstrations of the indomitable spirit of the Polish people seeking freedom and expressing religious fervor. Poland has been partitioned four times but the Poles will never be wiped out because of this indomitable spirit and religious fervor. She suffered heavily during World War II, with some 6 million persons, or 15 percent of her population, killed. But despite complete Communist domination as a result of the defeat of Hitler, the free spirit of the Polish people overflows at every opportunity. The world recently witnessed this once again in the tremendous reception and ovation given by the people of Warsaw to Vice President NIXON.

Mr. Speaker, as we look back upon the Polish invasion in 1939, let us hope that Communist conquerors of Poland today will likewise look back and contemplate the folly of a vicious and brutal Hitler who, like the Communists, tried to impose a totalitarian and antihumanistic order upon continental Europe. Let Hitler's lesson be their lesson as tensions in the world continue unabated and as the Communists continue to press on their relentless drive in Laos, Berlin, the Mideast, and the Straits of Formosa for world conquest.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, what made Hitler's attack on Poland 20 years ago so despicable is the fact that it was carried out with brutal force, without provocation, and in a coldly calculated manner. This was no defensive action. There was not one scintilla of cause for German concern for their security from Poland. Here was a case of raw, brutal aggression.

A striking contrast to the immoral acts of Hitler was the radio broadcast yesterday of West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer to the Polish people on the eve of the 20th anniversary of the attack on Poland. Here was a plea by a Christian leader, a plea for forgiveness, a plea that future Polish-German relations be based upon true friendship.

Perhaps, it will be difficult for the Poles ever to forgive the Germans for the terror and destruction the Nazi armies had wrought to the beloved country. Still, as a God-fearing people the Polish people know well the Christian virtue of forgiveness, and I have no doubt that they as a people will do what is right according to the dictates of their consciences.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues in commemorating the 20th anniversary of the brutal and dastardly attack, upon the Polish nation, by Nazi armies, which took place on the morning of September 1, 1939.

It is a tragic anniversary that we are observing. It marks the beginning of a war which engulfed the entire globe, and which brought untold sufferings and death to millions of peoples. It was a war built upon the schemes of a madman, whose cruel designs subjected countless persons to the most inhuman horrors and sacrifices.

It is also, however, an anniversary of heroism seldom matched in the annals of recent history: The heroism of the Polish people. It brings to mind their courageous resistance to Hitler's armies, their tragic defense of Warsaw, their continued fight for freedom through the 2 decades that followed. It also brings to mind their present unhappy state under the domination of communism imposed and supported by Moscow.

As we pause on this anniversary, it is fitting that we recall all that went with it—and particularly the breaking of treaties and the doublecrosses perpetrated not only by Hitler but also by Stalin, the leader of the Soviet Union. Their treachery, consummated in the rape of Poland, should be a lesson to us, and a reminder as we turn to consider our present and future course.

In our hopes and plans for the future, let us not forget the lesson that history has taught us, the bitter lesson about the treachery and cruelty of totalitarianism and of communism. If we forget, we and our children will reap the tragic fruit of our folly.

OUR TRIBUTE TO WALTER LEE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and that all Members may have 5 legislative days to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, after 21 years of friendly and efficient service as legislative assistant to the House Judiciary Committee, Walter Lee is preparing to go back home to Mississippi.

I sincerely regret that Walter is unable to be here at the Capitol today due to the fact that last week he suffered a brain hemorrhage with a cerebral upset that caused his removal to the hospital for emergency treatment. There is no doubt that this condition was brought about due to this extra heavy workload on the Claims Committee during these final days of this session of Congress. But I am pleased to note that although his situation was most serious on last Friday, that they have today allowed him to return home to the care and efficient treatment and attention of his attending physician and his good and loyal wife Helen Lee.

As 1959 comes to an end, this genial public servant whose diplomatic skill and talent for details has helped so many people, both in and out of Congress, will say "farewell" to the Washington scene. And with his departure we shall lose a southern gentleman whose ability, charm and good will have contributed so much to the achievements of the Judiciary Committee.

I do not know whether he is a descendant of the beloved Robert E. Lee, but I am certain that his own life was molded and inspired by the example of that great leader who won the respect and admiration of all.

Walter's grandfather was an officer of the Confederate Army. Walter's granduncle, from Illinois, served as an officer of the Union Army. From them he inherited the twin faith of his belief in the North and his belief in the South. In him there developed the wise and generous spirit of conciliation that is so essential to reasonable compromise and progress.

And so he brought to the Members of this House the bipartisan service that has assisted us in adjusting our differences, and has guided us in the construction of those laws that are necessary for the government of our growing Nation.

His knowledge and his integrity encouraged us to rely more and more on his good judgment. The responsibilities we delegated to him were always carried out faithfully and effectively. Details that would be overlooked by most people, were a challenge to Walter. Nothing escaped his dutiful and ever-courteous attention. It was comforting to know that, whenever we came up against a difficult problem, Walter's alert mind and harmonizing personality would find a workable solution.

In his younger days, he was elected by his neighbors as County Assessor of the area which includes Jackson, the State capital of Mississippi. Knowing him as we do now, we wonder why he did not continue his career as an elected public official. With his intelligence, and his liking for people, he could not have missed promotion to Representative, and Senator, in the Congress of the United States.

As a veteran of World War I, he has been an active member of the American Legion through all the years since it was founded. There is not a State in the Union—with the possible exception of Alaska and Hawaii—that he has not visited in connection with his work for the Legion.

With his outgoing spirit, Walter's main interest in life is: "What can I do to help?" Before you can think of something constructive, he is doing it.

But why did not he seek the honors of elective public office? I believe that Walter, after surveying the rewards and the hazards, came to the sensible conclusion that he could accomplish more as a key member of a committee staff, freed from distractions, than as a Congressman who has to "run the gauntlet" every 2 years, to determine whether he shall "come" or "go."

Statistics prove that Walter is right. Of those who were Members of the House of Representatives, when he arrived to serve as legislative assistant to the Committee on Claims, only 51 "survive."

But the Nation has benefited from Walter's services throughout that whole period, which proves the importance of career men in Government to provide the seasoned experience and continuity that is safe from the uncertainties of politics. As legislative assistant to the Judiciary Committee, his services have been far greater than the Nation can ever recognize or repay. The general public is not aware of this, but every Congressman, department head, and newspaperman in Washington is indebted to the gracious and dependable Walter Lee.

Frankly, I don't know what we are going to do without him. There are many other Members who feel the same way. In our regret at this leaving, we want to express our heartfelt appreciation for his fine work and his friendship.

We believe that the Congress should honor outstanding legislative assistants like Walter Lee. And so we ask this privilege to informally observe this as Walter Lee Day in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Before I yield to other Members, I want to convey my sincere and personal thanks to Walter, and to wish him every happiness in his active retirement. The folks back home in Mississippi claim it is their turn now to welcome Walter Lee.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH] under whose supervision Walter served for many years as legislative assistant of the old Claims Committee, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH] was chairman of that committee for a good many years.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I know my good friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts wants the RECORD to be correct. I was never chairman of the Committee on Claims. It was, however, my privilege to be a member of that committee when some 21 years ago Walter Lee arrived to take up his duties which he has so devotedly and dispassionately discharged ever since. It was my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to be chairman of a subcommittee of that committee which under the careful and capable guidance of Walter Lee went to the then Territory of Hawaii, now our 50th State, the first time that a subcommittee of that committee, which incidentally was one of the first standing committees organized by the early Congress, to ever go out of the territorial boundaries of the United States. I say that we truly lose a devoted servant, one who has over the years discharged his onerous and burdensome duties with the high ideals we all like to think belong to the Congress of the United States. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, as I know you will, that the old Claims Committee, now the Claims Subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary, provides a forum unique in itself—a forum where people may come when they can go nowhere else—citizens and aliens alike, to seek justice. Under Walter Lee's capable guidance, they received it. I join with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Speaker, in hoping for Walter and his wife, Helen, many years of continued good health and happiness. I would like him to know that I, as well as many, many hundreds of Members who have served under and with him will long and favorably remember him.

Mr. LANE. I can recall that the gentleman from New York was most active in the Committee on Claims for a good many years and worked hand in hand with Walter Lee.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from California, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and a very active and energetic member of committee No. 2 in charge of private claims and other general legislation of that committee.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Speaker, it is, perhaps, presumptuous of me, a junior member of the subcommittee, to join in this tribute in the face of older and more experienced heads who have had a great deal more experience with the man to whom this tribute is being paid. Although I am a junior member, and have been a member of this committee for some 8 months, I have developed a great appreciation for the man we are losing by reason of his retirement and, obviously, a very well earned retirement. Of course, we are all grieved that at the conclusion of his service in the Congress, he should suffer this stroke of bad health. But, it has been a real pleasure to have his helpfulness during the days when we were learning the ropes and to enjoy the comfort of his warm personality and his delightful sense of humor.

Mr. LANE. I might say to the gentleman from California that knowing Helen Lee, Walter's wife as I do through personal contact throughout the years, I am satisfied that his health will soon be restored under the very able and efficient care of his life partner.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, a learned member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I am in the sixth term of my service in this body. During all that time, it has been my privilege to work with Walter Lee. I know of no individual who has a keener sense of what is right and what is fair and what is just. It fell to Walter's lot to be assigned as clerk of the House Committee on Claims. In that capacity, he had an opportunity to use his great talents and his sense of justice and righteousness because under our system of government, the Subcommittee on Claims is actually the highest court of equity.

There is an old equity maxim to the effect that there is no wrong without a remedy, and we find time and time again, week after week after week that the subcommittee brings out bills to do equity. Very frequently we find an individual who because of the silence of the law or the expiration of time within which he might vindicate his rights, on a technical basis is without right in our courts of justice; but the Claims Committee, as I say, is the highest court of equity to grant relief in these areas.

Walter as clerk of that Committee was agreeable to all Members of this body without reference to party; in fact, I should say that just last week the full House Committee on the Judiciary by unanimous vote applauded the work of Walter over the years. We are very regretful that the time has come for Walter to retire to private life, but I wish to join my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts and others in wishing to Walter and his good wife long years of happiness in retirement.

Mr. LANE. And, Mr. Speaker, I may say that the gentleman from Louisiana in all modesty in mentioning the fact that the Committee on the Judiciary went on record recently in reference to the past work of Walter Lee, failed to say that he was the member of that committee who authored the motion in the full committee that resolutions be drawn up congratulating Walter for his excellent work over these 21 years on Capitol Hill.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado, another member of the Committee on the Judiciary, another hard-working, conscientious, and sincere Member.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, one of the first employees on the Judiciary Committee I had the pleasure of knowing was the genial Walter Lee. He was a southern gentleman with a smile. He devoted his full time to the members of the Judiciary Committee. When any Member of the House desired information Walter supplied it and was courteous to all. He had full knowledge of matters coming within the jurisdiction of the subcommittee he worked on; and, as has been pointed out, the Subcommittee on Claims constitutes really a court of equity.

Mr. Lee's experience while not that of a lawyer was one of kind understanding of the problems that were presented and injustices that may have accumulated throughout the years in the administration of our country.

Walter was quick and alert to ascertain and determine those things that constituted equity within themselves, and for that reason he was one of the valuable employees who contributed much to his country and to the people of the United States.

We on the Judiciary Committee will miss him, but we wish him Godspeed and that he may have many years of happy retirement with his family.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I know whereof the gentleman from Colorado speaks, because he has on several occasions appeared before the Committee on which Walter served as legislative assistant.

I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDMONDSON].

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, every Member of this body is certainly aware of the fact that expert and able staff work is an indispensable requirement of both a good congressional office and a good congressional committee.

For more than 20 years, a friendly and able American named Walter Lee has been serving as legislative assistant to the Subcommittee on Claims of the distinguished House Committee on the Judiciary.

Every Member who has presented a matter before this subcommittee has observed at first hand the ability, the helpfulness, and the understanding of Walter Lee. He has been a wonderful help to me in the presentation of several matters, and his wisdom, experience, and acumen have been deeply appreciated.

Walter Lee will be missed by this body, and it will be most difficult to fill the professional shoes which he has ably worn for two decades.

I welcome this opportunity to join my colleagues in congratulating him upon his fine service to the House and the country, and to wish him good health and good fortune for years to come.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the other Members of the House and particularly the Committee on the Judiciary in paying tribute to a man whom I felt was a great public servant.

Sometimes there appears on the horizon an unusually bright star. I consider Walter's service, his dedication, and his devotion to be of that magnitude.

I might say that all of us who are objectors on the Private Calendar felt that we could turn to Walter Lee at all times not only to give us the information we found necessary when we had some question about legislation before us, but also to give us the reasoning, which was always right and just, to support it. I for one will miss him in the House of Representatives. While my services are limited in this body, yet during the time I have spent here I have appreciated the services of Walter Lee. I hope his example will be an example to others who come into the service of this Congress or this Government from time to time. As a staff member, in my opinion, he had no peer. He was always friendly. I would like to do the honor of paying him respect for the work he did.

Mr. LANE. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina who has been in constant touch with Mr. Lee since he is one of our able and capable House objectors on the majority side on the Private Calendar.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. I know that the gentleman has been acquainted with Walter Lee for a good many years as one who came from the State of Mississippi and who had much in common over the years.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the gentleman from Massachusetts, one of the elder statesmen of the Committee on the Judiciary, one with considerable seniority, for taking the lead in paying this fine tribute to my fellow Mississippian, Walter Lee.

I would also like to compliment other members of the committee and other Members of the House here who likewise have extolled his virtues and service in this House.

I speak briefly, mostly from my own personal contacts with Walter Lee. It is my privilege to have known him for some 30 years or more. As a matter of fact, we were both World War I veterans, and I recall that the first time I met Walter was when we fought the second battle of Paris together, when we attended the American Legion Convention that was held in Paris.

Walter had that happy faculty of endearing himself to all of those with whom he came in contact. He is a man of high character and many sterling qualities. His service merits the splendid tributes that have been paid to him on this, the occasion of his departure from Government service. He has incurred the compliments and the respect of those who had the opportunity to work with him and to know him.

Mr. Speaker, I am very much distressed to learn of his illness. I hope it is of a transitory nature and that he and his attractive wife, Helen, may have many years back in the homeland in Mississippi to enjoy a well-deserved retirement.

Mr. LANE. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi. I know he has known Walter longer and better than any of us. I am more than pleased that Walter, over the years, has been such a fine friend of the gentleman from Mississippi and one of his able and conscientious supporters for a good many years.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the other Members of the House who have said such complimentary things about our beloved and loyal worker, Walter Lee; and, particularly, I wish to join with the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Mississippi when he praised the elder statesman from Massachusetts for making possible this so-called Walter Lee Day in Congress.

I know of no man in Congress who enjoys more respect of his fellow Members and who is a more distinguished Member of the House than our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

In talking of Walter Lee I can go back to the time when I first arrived here in Congress some 16 years ago. About 14 years ago when I became a member of the Claims Committee, of which Walter Lee was counsel and clerk, I served, as other Members of Congress who have spoken here today have, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Claims Committee, and it was Walter Lee who not only showed his expert ability in the various problems and claims that came before my subcommittee and other subcommittees of the old Claims Committee, but he showed himself to be a man of tremendous warmth and he had a tremendous capacity for friendship. I have never seen him do an unfair act toward any Member of Congress. On the contrary, I can say that he spent his whole time in dedicated devotion to helping members of that committee on both sides of the aisle, whether they were Republicans or Democrats.

His capacity for friendship and his ability to get things done, as far as the Claims Committee is concerned, seemed unending. And, I can truthfully say here today that no man has ever tried harder to do his job with a greater degree of conscientious effort and with more dedication of purpose than did Walter Lee. Of course, when the Reorganization Act went into effect, the Claims Committee was moved over to the Committee on the Judiciary. But, I did not lose contact with Walter Lee, because he is a man whose friendship grows and grows as you stay with him and be around him more and more. I have come to the conclusion that today, Congress has suffered a tremendous loss in seeing Walter Lee depart, and all of us will always miss him. Perhaps I am in a little better position and maybe I am more fortunate than many other Members of Congress because of the fact that he is leaving Washington, where he has done his job well and faithfully, and will return to his homeland with his beautiful and beloved wife. The fact is that from a geographical standpoint my congressional district adjoins his, and we are just a few hundred miles apart. So, as far as my friendship and contact with Walter Lee are concerned, it does not come to an end with him leaving Washington, but I look forward to the many years when he will be living in Jackson, Miss., which is close to my hometown. I know that good fortune will smile on me and give me the opportunity of continuing our very close and devoted friendship in the years to come. As for Walter Lee, I think it has been demonstrated today that there has been no man who ever worked for the U.S. Congress in any capacity that had more respect and more love and devotion from the Members of the Congress. The reason for that, I think, is the fact that Walter Lee is a very warm, devoted, dedicated man who helped every Member of the Congress, who put their troubles, their problems, ahead of his. And, I have never seen him ever fail to try to help each and every Member of the Congress and do it in a fair and just way. He is a great American, a great and wonderful person, and may God bless him for the rest of his days.

Mr. LANE. I want to thank the gentleman from Louisiana. No truer statement was ever made on the floor of the House with respect to Walter Lee by the gentleman from Louisiana, because of his association with him all these years as a Member of the Congress, knowing that Walter has been fair to the Members on both sides of the aisle, regardless of party and regardless of the location of their congressional districts.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANE. I will be happy to yield to the youngest member on the Committee on the Judiciary, and one of the most active and able members of the Claims Committee, Committee No. 2 of the Committee on the Judiciary; a man who has been here only a short period of time, but in that period of time has learned much and has contributed greatly by his accomplishments here in the Congress for the benefit of his constituents back home in Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my chairman for those kind remarks. A while ago I came into this chamber not to speak, but rather to hear these remarks about Walter Lee. At this time I want to join my distinguished chairman and my other distinguished colleagues in paying my respects to Walter Lee. Even though I have been on the subcommittee to which Walter Lee has rendered such long and faithful service, in my own case for such a short time, nonetheless I, too, will miss him.

Mr. LANE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to know Walter Lee during the 17 years that I have been a Member of Congress. It was my privilege also to serve as a member of the Subcommittee on Claims of which Mr. Lee was the clerk.

Mr. Lee has served the committee, as well as all Members of the House, faithfully, efficiently, and cheerfully. I join with other Members in paying tribute to my friend, Walter Lee, and wish him good health, a long life, and abundant happiness in the future.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in tribute to Walter Lee, one of the finest men I have ever known; a public servant with integrity as firm and as solid as a granite mountain; a friend with a heart of gold.

Walter, our heartiest good wishes go with you into private life. We pray that all your years will be happy years.

Please come back to see us at every chance.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] and with other Members of the House in expressing my own personal regret and sorrow at the forthcoming retirement of Walter Lee as legislative assistant to the House Subcommittee on Claims.

The fact that Walter Lee has held his position for over 21 years is testimony in itself to the effective and diligent work which he has rendered to the Members of this House and to their staffs. His advice and counsel on the merits of any proposed legislation have been widely sought for their accuracy and soundness. Walter Lee is held in high esteem by all on Capitol Hill.

Personally, I wish to express my deep gratitude to Walter Lee for the warm friendship which he has extended to me throughout the years and for his wholehearted cooperation in our dealings with regard to legislative matters.

I heartily congratulate him as he enters into a well-deserved and well-earned retirement and wish for him good health, good fortune, and continued success in the days that lie ahead.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, we are today honoring Walter Lee upon the occasion of his retirement. It is a great pleasure for me to join with the other Members and Walter's innumerable friends here in giving paeans of praise to this fine gentleman whose outstanding work has merited this recognition known as Walter Lee Day.

Walter has been our stalwart and dependable help on the Claims Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee during my entire membership in the House and the Judiciary Committee. I have personal knowledge of his devotion to his duty and his conscientious efforts at all times. His vast storehouse of knowledge and his judiciousness and fairness in processing the work which came within the purview of his duties in the Claims Subcommittee have been of inestimable assistance to the Congress and its Members.

His diligence and his loyalty in spending long hours, even at night, in pursuing his tasks have, unfortunately, taken a temporary toll of his health and he is today suffering from an illness which I am sure is an aftermath of overwork. It is my fervent hope that he will have a full recovery, with no lingering impairment, and that he will be able to enjoy to the fullest many long years of retirement which he deserves in the richest measure.

It has been a rare privilege for me to know and work with Walter Lee. In addition to his efficiency and loyalty, he is a warmhearted and wonderful friend to which I know his multitude of friends will attest. We will miss Walter here but we rejoice with him in the expectation of treasured leisure hours filled with the enjoyment of long-deferred pleasures. We wish him the best of health in the years ahead and good luck and happiness in his every endeavor.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it is particularly fitting that Members of Congress suitably pay tribute to Walter Lee. If every one of us who has been helped by this devoted public servant should take 1 minute to express our appreciation, we would be here for the next several days. It is sufficient to say that everyone who ever went to Walter Lee with a problem concerning a claim received friendly and capable advice. Walter seemed to regard each one of our problems as a challenge to himself personally to find the way toward accomplishment.

I shall never forget his help in the case of the Texas City Disaster Compensation. He worked for years to pass a bill which would compensate those who were injured or who had sustained losses because of that great disaster. It was due, to a large extent, to his persistence and his careful guidance that some $17 million was paid to the claimants. I know that each one of them would join me in extending greetings to Walter and all good wishes for the future, and particularly that his present illness may be short, and his recovery soon and complete.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I join with all my colleages in the House today in paying well-deserved tribute to Walter Lee, who is retiring at the end of this session of Congress as counsel for the Claims Subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee.

Shortly after I took the oath of office as a Member of the 84th Congress I met Walter Lee. From that day on we have been very good friends. I regard him as one of the finest men I have ever known in any walk of life. I am indeed grateful to Walter for his outstanding service and for the many instances in which he has personally assisted me with my congressional duties.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone were to sketch a word portrait of Walter Lee they would certainly depict a public servant who was cheerful and cooperative to the Members and their staffs on Capitol Hill. Regardless of what others might present in their sketch, my portrait of Walter Lee shows him to be a man of honor, integrity, and certainly a true American.

Our friendship has been, at least to me, a source of inspiration and pleasure which has grown more rewarding with each passing year. Therefore, I hope the future will afford more opportunities for pleasant association between us, and that I shall have the pleasure of seeing and talking to Walter from time to time. In any event, it is my wish that Walter Lee and his family may enjoy good health and the very best of everything for years to come.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I rise to commend Mr. Walter R. Lee, the man we are honoring today. Mr. Lee is to be praised for his years of dedicated service to his State and to his Nation. His long record of public service has earned him the admiration of his fellowmen and has placed him in a position where he has had the respect of all of those with whom he has worked. His honesty, integrity and friendly counsel have been beacons of faith to those of us who have learned to depend upon him during these past years.

A veteran of World War I, member of the American Legion, the 40 and 8, the Masons, and the Methodist Church, Mr. Lee has served with distinction in every position he has held. Before coming to Washington he served the people of his home county—Hinds County, Miss.—for 2 terms as their tax assessor. From Jackson, Miss., he came to Washington in 1940, to serve as clerk of the Subcommittee on Claims of the House Judiciary Committee, in which position he served until the passage of the Reorganization Act in 1946 when he became the legislative assistant to the Subcommittee on Claims of the House Judiciary Committee. He has served in this position continuously since that time.

Mr. Lee has always served with distinction and it is in efficient public servants like him that we, the Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, have learned to place our trust and have looked to when we need that extra bit of help which the hard working committee staff members so willingly give.

So it is with sadness that I realize that the Congress is losing the services of one of its most trusted and valuable employees. I have just one warning: If the fish and game of Hinds County, Miss., are pursued by Walter Lee with the same vigor and persistency as he pursued his works on the Claims Subcommittee, there will be a whole lot less game for the other hunters and fishermen.

He has my best wishes always. It has been a privilege to call Walter Lee "friend."

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in paying tribute to Walter Lee. I am happy to see him receive this recognition today which he so richly deserves.

I met Walter Lee when I first came to Congress in 1941. My first assignment in the 77th Congress was to the Committee on Claims. The chairman at that time was Dan McGehee, of Mississippi, and Walter Lee was the very efficient clerk of the committee. I was a member of this committee for 6 years and during this period worked very closely with Walter. I had the opportunity to observe his work and conduct, and I formed a very favorable impression of him, which has been confirmed by my contacts with him over the years.

Walter Lee was always courteous and anxious to be of help. The Claims Committee at this time handled a large number of private bills, and Walter had the responsibility of seeing that the bills received prompt and adequate consideration. He did an excellent job and it was a real pleasure to work with him.

In recent years I have had occasion to call Walter from time to time about pending bills. I have always found him anxious to serve and to be of any assistance possible. He has certainly been very helpful to me, and I want to acknowledge the debt of gratitude I owe him.

The retirement of Walter Lee will be a great loss to the House, not only to the members of the Judiciary Committee, but to each of us. I hope Walter enjoys his retirement, and I wish him much happiness in the years ahead. I shall always treasure pleasant memories of our friendship.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to Members to extend their remarks about Walter Lee, I am most pleased to have this opportunity to record my appreciation of his services during the 21 years that he occupied the responsible position of executive secretary of the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Lee became associated with the Congress only a few years before I was elected but immediately it was evident by his interest in the problems of my office that he was dedicated to his job. He fulfilled his responsibilities to the very highest degree and it is no wonder that he made so many friends among the Members of Congress. Always courteous, always efficient, and always available to discuss any problem that came within his jurisdiction with any Member of the House, I join my office staff in expressing our appreciation and thanks to him for his never-ending courtesy.

It must be a great satisfaction to him at this time of his retirement from public office to leave knowing that he has done his job well and has merited the praise and thanks of the Members of the House. I hope that the days to come may be filled with many rich blessings and I know that he will look back with contentment and satisfaction over the years which he spent in the service of his Government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues and I were saddened to hear of Walter Lee's decision to retire at the end of this session of Congress. For more than 21 years, he has served faithfully and efficiently as legislative assistant to the House Subcommittee on Claims. We were further distressed to learn of his brain hemorrhage and cerebral upset last week which confined him to a hospital for emergency treatment. We note that improvement has been made and that he is now resting quietly at home with his loved ones.

Walter Lee will be sorely missed by many of us in the Halls of Congress. Fifty-one Members are still in the House of Representatives who were here when Walter first came to serve more than two decades ago. All of us who have had anything to do with this House subcommittee will remember him for his cheerfulness and cooperation in preparing and handling the difficult and complex claims bills presented to Congress. In his work, Walter Lee was one of those quiet, capable, conscientious souls who are never fully appreciated until they have left. Only then is the full measure of their contribution, of their helpfulness, of their devotion, realized. We wonder, certainly in the case of Walter Lee, how we are going to get along without him.

At this time let us, first of all, pray that our colleague will soon regain his health. Then may we all wish him and his wife many happy, rich, and full years of retirement that they so richly deserve.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, time has been set aside by the House to honor one of its finest servants and a man who has done long and excellent service for the people of the United States over many years. I refer to Walter Lee, who is retiring from active duty with the House Committee on the Judiciary.

Almost every Member of the House has, at one time or another, had a problem to deal with that came to the attention of this fine committee. And, unless one is an attorney or has had long experience with these problems in the House, one is at a loss as to where to turn and what course of action to follow.

That is, one would be if it were not for the fact that the committee has had on its staff Walter Lee. I know from personal experience that on many occasions I have had to prepare legislation or to follow up legislation and have not known from past experience exactly where and how to proceed. On these occasions I have always been able to turn to Walter Lee for advice and help. He has always been there to give that kind of advice and has always been eager to help.

Walter Lee is leaving the Judiciary Committee staff. He will be sorely missed, particularly by the new Members of the House, who will not—as I have had—have the opportunity to turn to Walter Lee for his sound advice and counsel.

In closing, might I add that Mr. Lee's help was never a matter of partisanship. Whether a member of the Republican or Democratic Party, Mr. Lee was equally helpful when asked by a Member of Congress for assistance.

In his retirement, the public is losing a good and faithful servant. My one wish is that Mr. Lee will, in the remaining years, enjoy the life of retirement he has so well earned. I know that if to look back on a life of service brings happiness, Mr. Lee will be one of the happiest men on earth.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, it was with a real sense of shock that I learned of the illness of Walter Lee, for many years the efficient "chief of staff" of Subcommittee No. 2 of the Judiciary Committee on which I am honored to serve. Mr. Lee has shepherded the work of the Claims Subcommittee through many difficult and crowded legislative sessions, and I am sure we all hope to see him soon restored to full health.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, for a third of a century my life long friend and neighbor, Walter Lee, has rendered devoted public service to his fellow man. As an elected official of Hinds County, he served the people of Mississippi, and as an aide to the House of Representatives, he served the people of all the States.

Walter Lee has contributed much to the important work of the House of Representatives. Although overburdened with multiple duties, he nevertheless always found time to give courteous attention to the problems of Members and their staffs. I can personally attest to his efficiency, devotion to duty, and integrity. He has been of invaluable assistance to the district I represent.

Walter Lee will be missed here. His friendliness, wit, and human qualities will leave a void that will not be easily or quickly filled.

There is consolation for me in the fact that the Congress' loss will result in a net gain for my congressional district and the State of Mississippi. He is returning to his home in Jackson. There he will have time for old friends and civic activities. With his charming wife, Helen, and his granddaughter, Walter can continue his service to man in a less complex atmosphere. Surrounded by mementos of a life given to public service, he will enjoy a less frenzied existence. Such will be richly deserved.

Fortunately, I will be able to visit with Walter Lee in the future—more often than other Members—because his home is only a few miles from mine. Therefore, I will continue to have the benefit of his wise counsel.

My sincere good wishes go with him in his future undertakings.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not on the floor of the House when the distinguished chairman of the House Subcommittee on Claims of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. LANE], addressed this House in a very factual yet heart-warming tribute of Walter Lee.

I join my distinguished friend from Massachusetts and the other distinguished members of the subcommittee in praising Mr. Lee upon his completion of 21 years of loyal and efficient service to the House Judiciary Committee.

Since I am a freshman in the House, Mr. Lee's aid to me was of immeasurable help in guiding me through the early procedures of the committee work. I found him at all times considerate, patient, genial, and friendly. I know from my experience on the committee of the great contributions he has made to the success of this committee. I know from having talked to him that he shall miss his association with the House committee and the Members, but I know, too, the memories he takes with him will be pleasant ones and will grow more pleasant as the years go by.

I wish for Walter Lee many years of happiness with his friends back in Mississippi and trust that he will enjoy to the fullest the retirement he has so richly earned and deserves.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret that we learned of the upcoming retirement of Walter Lee, of the Judiciary Committee staff, as we feel the Capitol will lose the services of one of its most able and dedicated aides.

By his friendly and sympathetic handling of every request, Walter Lee has established a guide of service for many to follow. He has always been most helpful to everyone who has found the need for information and advice from the Judiciary Committee.

I am sure that Walter will enjoy some time for rest and leisure, well earned by his many years of fine service here at the House of Representatives, but we will all miss his prompt and helpful assistance which has often been taken for granted because of his consistent efforts to give his full attention to every case and request to him.

Mr. THOMPSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, through my tenure of office it has been my great privilege to have known and associated with Walter Lee, a native of Mississippi and a dedicated servant of Congress in Washington for many years. It is with great reluctance that I accept the fact that Walter is retiring to a well-deserved vacation. However, it is my hope that he will have many years of happiness ahead with his lovely wife, pursuing those things of which he dreamed for many years. His unselfish service in Washington will serve as an inspiration certainly for me and, I am sure, for the many others whom he has "faded on" by association over the years. I hope it will be my good fortune to visit with Walter in the future and maintain the warmth of friendship over the years with this great American.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed emotions that I learned of the recent retirement of Walter Lee from his important post of counsel to the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Claims. Through the years I have grown accustomed to relying on his wellspring of knowledge and his dependable judgment, and it is, therefore, with something near regret that I see him go. On the other hand, I realize that the faithful and competent fulfillment of the heavy demands for his personal service merits a well-deserved rest, and it is my prayer that he may enjoy peace and good health within the circle of his friends and loved ones throughout many years to come.

It is a source of pleasure for me to recall the warm personal friendship that I have shared with Walter Lee over the years, and it is my hope that I have not imposed on our friendship in a professional capacity. He has always taken a keen interest in the problems of my office, as he has those of every Member during more than 20 years, and for his innumerable services, I shall be eternally grateful. It would be especially remiss for me to have passed up this opportunity to pay tribute to Walter Lee, a grand gentleman, an excellent lawyer, and a great fellow Mississippian.

Although Walter Lee has vacated his office, the memory of his cheerful and cooperative spirit, his quiet dedication, and his personal ability will linger on as an inspiration to those of us who remain. It is to be regretted that he was the victim of a brain hemorrhage last week, but it is comforting to note the rapidity with which he is recovering. My prayer is for the swift and complete restoration of his health so that he may fully enjoy with his gracious and charming wife and family the years of retirement which he so rightfully deserves.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, when I came to the Congress in January of 1943, a new, green and inexperienced freshman Congressman, Walter Lee was among the first to visit my office to extend a cordial welcome to the Hill, and to make his guiding counsel available. Although I did not know Walter personally before that time, I had known him by reputation—a reputation which was good, indeed. He comes from a prominent and refined rural family most of whom I know personally.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in the fact that Walter is a native of my congressional district. While the citizens of the city of Jackson and of Hinds County in Mississippi claim him as their own, in reality he belongs to the people and the soil of Calhoun County, Miss., where he first saw the light of day and lived until his maturity. Even after all of these many years since he has lived and worked in Jackson and in Washington, Walter himself looks upon his native county as home. He frequently returns to the scene of his youth so as to renew and enjoy the associations of his early life and the worship in the little country church where he first came to know and dedicate himself to the service of the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

Observing and appreciating his high quality and ability, Walter was persuaded by the beloved Congressman Dan McGehee, of Mississippi, to assume the clerkship of the old Claims Committee. He served with such proficiency that upon the party switch in chairmanships which was effected in the 80th Congress, Walter was urged to stay on as clerk of the Claims Committee. In fact, the late, lamented and lovable Judge Jennings, of Knoxville, who was slated to assume the chairmanship of the committee in the 80th Congress, conditioned his accepting this high responsibility upon the committee reelecting Walter as the committee clerk. There was no issue about it. He was retained and has there remained throughout these many years.

This, Mr. Speaker, is proof of the fact that Walter was then and is now one of the most efficient committee clerks ever to serve on Capitol Hill. It is further proof that Walter has endeared himself to all Members of the House of Representatives, both Democrat and Republican. With his wonderful smile, penetrating personality and accommodating spirit he has established for himself the reputation of being everyone's friend, which indeed he really is.

Walter has earned the retirement which he is now about to enjoy. As he leaves our midst he does so with our profound thanks for his valuable services and with our good wishes to both him and his charming and attractive wife, Helen, that they will enjoy many restful, pleasant and happy years in their dream house down in the good Magnolia State of Mississippi. We wish them well and we particularly wish for Walter a speedy recovery from his current illness.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the retirement of my good friend, Walter Lee, is a real loss to the Congress. Never have we had a more capable, affable, and conscientious man to handle the highly complex matters which come before the Judiciary Committee.

I first knew Walter Lee when he was an outstanding public official in Mississippi many years ago. Then, as now, he reflected credit to himself in his handling of any job. Through the years we have been close personal friends. While we lose him here, it is Mississippi's gain, for he and his wonderful family are returning to Jackson to make their home.

We wish for him many happy and fruitful years in that fine city, Jackson, in what to me is the finest State, Mississippi.

PANAMA CANAL: THATCHER FERRY SITE BRIDGE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to address this House on many occasions with regard to various questions related to the Panama Canal. In the course of my studies of this complicated subject as a member of the Appriations Subcommittee dealing with Panama Canal affairs, I have been impressed by the range of the vision of the original planners of the Canal and of the authors of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, which authorized the acquisition of the Canal Zone in perpetuity, construction of the Panama Canal, and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection.

But the framers of this key treaty and the early planners did not foresee everything. One significant failure was omission of a treaty stipulation for an adequate public crossing of the waterway for use after construction. As a result, the Canal Zone and the Republic of Panama were cut in two, causing the greatest inconvenience to residents of the isthmus and making remedial action imperative.

Though this situation was recognized even during the construction era, the first to meet it adequately was Representative Maurice H. Thatcher, of Kentucky, a former member of the Committee on Appropriations, who, during the period 1910–13, had been a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission and Civil Governor of the Canal Zone, and was thus thoroughly acquainted with isthmian needs.

In 1929, Representative Thatcher introduced, and later secured passage by the Congress of, legislation approved May 27, 1930, authorizing the establishment of a free ferry system near the Pacific entrance of the canal and construction of a road connecting the western ferry terminus with the road system of Panama, each project officially named in his honor upon Panamanian suggestion.

During both peace and war these two projects, which began operating in the fall of 1932, proved to be most important contributions to Isthmian life and post-construction era development—essential for the millions of passengers and hundreds of thousands of vehicles which have annually used them. Thus, their names have been clearly woven into the fabric of Isthmian history.

Growing vehicular traffic, however, led to demands by Panama for greater canal crossing capacity at the Pacific end. In response to these demands one stipulation in the 1955 Eisenhower-Remon treaty was a provision for construction by the United States of a bridge to replace the Thatcher Ferry. Authorized by legislation approved July 23, 1956, construction on the bridge project, originally estimated to cost $20 million, started in January 1959. The bridge will cross the route of the Thatcher Ferry and connect with the Thatcher Highway.

Tentatively scheduled for completion in December 1962, the Thatcher Ferry Bridge will more adequately meet increasing traffic demands, serve as a link in the Pan American Highway, contribute further to Isthmian life and developments, and, it is but fair to state, constitute another monument to the generosity of the United States in dealing with the Republic of Panama.

An informative summary of the history of the Balboa crossing by Elmer B. Stevens, resident engineer for the bridge project, was published in the September-October 1959, issue of the Military Engineer, the Journal of the Society of American Military Engineers. The article is accompanied by the following biographical sketch of its author:

Elmer B. Stevens is resident engineer for the Balboa Bridge report. He was employed primarily in the field of bridge engineering in the United States before going to the Panama Canal in 1936 where he has since been identified with the structural aspects of a number of large projects in the Canal Zone. Prior to his present position he was structural engineer for the Panama Canal Company. Mr. Stevens is a graduate of the University of Vermont.

In regard to the question of major canal improvements now being considered by a special board of consultants under the direction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, it is gratifying to note in the article that author Stevens states that engineers have recognized the futility of passive defense measures against modern weapons. This view has been consistently advocated by leading Members of the Congress who have studied canal defense problems in connection with the question of type of canal, most notably Senator THOMAS E. MARTIN, of Iowa, and Representative CLARK W. THOMPSON, of Texas, whose views are extensively recorded in the annals of the Congress.

The indicated article follows:

THE LAND REUNITED

(By Elmer B. Stevens)

Fifty years ago on the Isthmus of Panama the 400-year-old dream of a western passage by sea to the Orient was being realized. The activity that gave birth to the phrase, "The land divided, the world united," was under a full head of steam in a very literal sense. It puffed erratically from the exhaust ports of a thousand cylinders on shovels, dredges, locomotives, hoists, donkeys, and cranes. Thousands of backs sweated under the combined effects of a tropical sun and the relentless goading of construction bosses, and were periodically cleansed and cooled by tropical showers that also turned to steam when they hit the ground.

In the midst of this dedicated advance toward a goal on which the eyes of the world were focused, it is not surprising that an unrecognized injury was inflicted on the local scene. The process of dividing the land and uniting the sealanes of world commerce also divided a newborn country into two geographical components. At the time, this had little significance; not only was the country politically new, but also it was physically undeveloped. A single unimproved road threaded its way from the city of Panama, on the east side of the proposed canal, across the site to distant palm-thatched villages in the western provinces. Wet-season mire and dry-season dust limited the use of the road primarily to cattlemen herding their products to market and returning with supplies carried on the backs of animals or in oxcarts. An automobile was still a curiosity. If the changes of the next 50 years had been at the same rate as those of the past, it is doubtful that the local effects of the land divided would yet be significant.

It is to the credit of the builders of the Panama Canal that they were aware of a future problem in connection with vehicular traffic across the canal. A tunnel under the Pacific end was considered in 1913 and a design and cost estimate were prepared. The cost was probably less a deterrent to approval of the project than the effect it would have had on the construction schedule of the canal. The tunnel was sacrificed for expediency and, for nearly three decades following the opening of the canal in 1914, most transcanal traffic was handled by ferries, the only exception being a limited amount that crossed specially prepared decks on the sea gates of the locks at Pedro Miguel and Gatun.

By the late 1930's, the rapid growth of Panama and the expansion of military bases in the Canal Zone revived interest in a rapid and convenient means of crossing the canal. As in 1913, a tunnel was preferred to a bridge, but for different reasons. In 1913 a tunnel would have been less costly than a high-level bridge because much of the necessary excavation for a tunnel existed as a byproduct of the locks construction. In the pre-World War II period, passive-defense concepts favored a tunnel, despite the cost, as being less vulnerable to aerial bombardment and sabotage. In late 1941, negotiations were underway with an engineering firm to design a tunnel but subsequent involvement in World War II caused further planning to be postponed.

In the meantime, partial relief to growing traffic was afforded by the construction of a swing bridge across Miraflores locks which was opened in 1942. This bridge was built primarily as an aid to the construction of the third locks project which was started just before the war and stopped because of it. Had this facility not been constructed, however, the ferry service could not have handled the postwar traffic. This bridge now carries the major portion of transcanal traffic, but its location as well as the delays caused by the ever-increasing marine traffic, make it an unsatisfactory answer to the problem.

The justification for a more convenient crossing of the canal was recognized in 1942 in an agreement between the United States and Panama. Recognizing the futility of passive defense against modern weapons, engineers have now decided upon a bridge rather than a tunnel as the most desirable and practical crossing. Always more economical than a tunnel, except for the special conditions that prevailed in 1913, a bridge provides the most convenient passage between the two parts of Panama. In early 1955, the cost of a high-level bridge at Balboa was estimated. Panama's increasing needs were again officially recognized in the 1955 Eisenhower-Remon treaty revisions, and the construction of an adequate bridge became a specific item in the new treaty. The bill authorizing it was passed by Congress and signed by the President on July 23, 1956.

The need for a convenient crossing of the Pacific end of the canal is evident from the map, figure 1. The two principal cities, Panama and Colon, and the international airport at Tocumen, lie on the east side of the canal; most of the remaining population, and the most highly developed agricultural area, lie on the west side. Many Panamanians living on the east side of the canal own farms, ranches, and business establishments on the west side, as well as vacation and weekend homes in the mountain areas or along the seashore. Cattle, sugar, and other industries of western Panama are expanding and the "cowboys" now come to the city in modern automobiles, and the cattle are brought in trucks. The city itself has more than doubled in population in the past 20 years. A convenient means of access to regions adjacent to the Canal Zone on the west side of the canal in the vicinity of Arraijan would open a large new area for suburban expansion. A high-level bridge ending on the border of Panama City would bring traffic from that area into the heart of the city in less time than it takes those who commute from the outlying areas to the east and northeast.

The present facilities for crossing the canal are already inconvenient for regular commuters from the west side. The Ferry at Balboa cannot handle the present volume of traffic and the longest delays at the swing bridge over Miraflores Locks generally occur at the rush hours in the morning and at night.

In addition to the local traffic of Panama City, long distance trucking from the western half of Panama to the terminal cities is constantly increasing along with agricultural development. Completion of the Pan American Highway all the way from the United States to Panama City is now scheduled within about the next 2 years. With that event there is bound to be a great increase in the long distance traffic, much of which will be trucking. Extension of the highway through the Darien Gap in eastern Panama to a connection in Colombia is now accepted as a possibility before long. When that occurs, the Balboa high-level bridge will be an important link not only in the Pan-American Highway, but also the Inter-American Highway.

If a crossing of the canal had been constructed in 1913, or soon thereafter, it undoubtedly would have been built at Pedro Miguel Locks or just to the north. The road from Panama City to the interior of western Panama led from that vicinity at the time. Subsequent construction of Thatcher Highway from the west side of the canal opposite La Boca to Arraijan on the Canal Zone-Panama border, and improvement of the road in Panama from Arraijan to Chorrera, has long since deflected trans-canal traffic to Mirflores and La Boca. Location of the now-proposed bridge, therefore, was narrowed to that portion of the canal bounded by these areas.

A location in the general vicinity of Miraflores would have provided a more direct connection with the Trans-Isthmian Highway between Panama City and Colon, which was constructed during the war, and along which there has been a phenomenal growth of Panamanian industry and residential areas. To be satisfactory, however, this location would have involved long elevated approaches, a longer major structure, serious complications with existing Air Force and Naval establishments, and would have been less satisfactory as a future link in the Inter-American Highway. The probable cost could have been double that of the authorized bridge at the La Boca site. Moreover, it would have been vulnerable to possible future plans for a modernized canal.

The site chosen at La Boca, which crosses the present ferry route at about a 40-degree angle, will bring traffic from western Panama to the edge of Panama City at a point where there is a choice of routes available for traffic destined to points beyond. As a link in the future Inter-American Highway, the selected site will be ideal when Panama City constructs a proposed connection between two existing wide avenues along its Panama Bay waterfront. Suitable foundation conditions have been found along the desired site at reasonable depths and, while approaches will necessarily have reversed curvature, they should be satisfactory. Navigation requirements dictate a lateral clearance normal to the canal axis of 1,000 feet between main piers and a vertical clearance of 201 feet above mean high water.

A cantilevered tied-arch type of bridge, (fig. 2), was selected and a contract was let for the final design.[1]

The estimated cost, including approaches and engineering, still stands in the neighborhood of the originally estimated $20 million and the tentative date for completion is December of 1962. Work on the approaches started in January 1959 and the contract for the main substructure was awarded in June.[2]

In view of general world conditions, the timeliness of this project is significant. Unity and solidarity of the Western Hemisphere has never been more important than it is today. The symbolism of this structure, as a uniting element between two parts of a country, two continents, two peoples, and as a link in an internatinal highway, far overshadows its physical proportions.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, there is presently before the House a resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 8601, the Civil Rights Act of 1959. House Resolution 362 would enable a petition to be signed for the discharge of H.R. 8601 from the Rules Committee.

Ordinarily I would be most reluctant to sign such a petition which bypasses the normal processes for the consideration of legislation. It would have to be an extraordinary situation that would impel me to support such a move.

That, precisely, is what I believe we are confronted with at this time. The 1st session of the 86th Congress is drawing to a close. The Congress has not had an opportunity to debate legislation in this very vital area and, unless emergency procedures are taken, it is entirely likely that the session will terminate sine die without the Members being afforded this possibility.

It is because of my deep concern lest we do adjourn having failed in our responsibility that I shall sign the discharge petition. At this late date, it is the only remedy possible.

I urge my colleagues to do likewise. The resolution is a reasonable document which provides for 2 days of debate after the bill has been discharged, and unlimited amendment under the 5-minute rule.

It is our God-given destiny as a nation to be continually enhancing the significance of the individual and respect for human dignity. We have an unsurpassable heritage of liberty and responsibility to protect and expand. This is our priceless gift to the ages. We cannot stand still.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the Members to sign the petition next week to provide for bringing to the floor for reasonable debate and consideration H.R. 8601 before this 86th Congress terminates its 1st session.

INTEREST RATES ON GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from

Utah [Mr. DIXON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, by shirking its responsibility to face up realistically to the situation that calls for higher interest rates on Government bonds, it is my opinion that the leadership of the Democratic Party is doing the people of America a great disservice. The issue should be permitted to be voted on in a clear cut fashion by both the House and the Senate.

I wholeheartedly agree with Senator BYRD who is reported as saying:

It seems to me to be somewhat inconsistent for the House to alibi itself around this very important matter when it has allowed the Senate no opportunity to act. Under the Constitution and custom the House originates legislation relating to taxation, debt, interest, etc. As the House, after weeks of consideration, has passed no interest rate bill, the Senate has had no opportunity to act. * * *

As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, I want to say to the distinguished Speaker that should the House pass such legislation, I will immediately call a meeting of the Finance Committee for action on it. I do not pretend to speak for what either the Senate Finance Committee or the Senate will do, but I regard some legislation as vital in the fiscal crisis involving the sale of Federal bonds which now confronts us.

We must be realistic. We know interest rates on nearly all non-Government issues of securities have increased, and the Government must meet the prevailing interest rates. I deplore this, but such is the case. * * *

Within the next 12 months the Government must borrow at least $85 billion, and, under present legislation, this enormous sum must be sold in short-term securities * * *.

There is not a single Treasury bond selling at par, and some are selling as low as 81, meaning that the purchaser of that particular issue of bonds at par has had a loss of 19 percent on his principal.

I personally am convinced that it is imperative that this Congress act before it adjourns, to increase the rate on Series E and H savings bonds which are held by small investors. Holders of these savings bonds are now paid an interest rate of 3 percent for the first 3 years and 3¼ percent if held 8 years and 11 months to maturity, while the large owners of Treasury bonds, at present quotations, can earn as much as 4.67 percent. This is not only a great injustice to the 40 million citizens who own $42 billion in series E and H savings bonds, but we can not overlook the fact that the owners of savings bonds have the right to cash them in, after 60 days and, should they do so, a crisis of first magnitude will confront the U. S. Treasury.

It would be calamitous if we tried to solve this problem by forcing the Federal Reserve System purchase of more Government bonds. This would mean printing money. Unquestionably it would lead to disastrous inflation * * *.

We have already lost one-half of the purchasing power of the dollar in 20 years. Inflation is our No. 1 problem. We must balance our budget, soundly finance our indebtedness and begin to pay off the principal, and do those things that any prudent man would do when faced with such conditions as confront our country today.

Mr. Speaker, for a number of years I had charge of three victory loan bond drives in my home county and I went all out to stake my reputation on U.S. bonds as a good investment and their purchase a patriotic duty. I am ashamed to say that the people who have bought our bonds have been exploited from start to finish and that failure to raise the interest on savings bonds so that they can go part way at least to compete with other investments will surely undo all the good we have done in teaching our people to save through investment in savings bonds.

Mr. Speaker, I call your attention and the attention of the Members of the House to a telegram from Frederick P. Champ, the Utah chairman of the U.S. savings bond program, as follows:

As Utah chairman U.S. savings bond program and worker in bond program since its inception I am sold on its basic importance in management of Federal debt and in providing individual and community reserves which time and again have proved their value. Upward adjustment of interest yield on these bonds to make them competitive is vital to the survival of this important program and we in Utah who are working as volunteers urgently bespeak your support of the Treasury's recommendations.

THE GERMAN-POLISH SITUATION

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of the 20th anniversary of Nazi Germany's attack on Poland, Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, speaking in the name of the German people, expressed his conviction that "the new Germany will some day be a good neighbor of Poland." This news report from Bonn in today's papers will highlight two statements of policy that were adopted on August 24, 1959—3 days before the President's visit to the West German Chancellor—at a meeting in Bonn of the federal delegates of the Union of Expellees.

The latter is the consolidated organization of all German expellees and refugees from the area east of the Iron Curtain. The membership of the Union of Expellees, exceeding in numbers that of the West German labor union or any veterans' association, makes it the largest organization of any type in West Germany today.

It was last winter that the several federations of those Germans who at the end of World War II had been expelled from their home Provinces of East Prussia, Pomerania, Silesia, from the Sudetenland and from the various East European countries, that were overrun by the Reds, merged into one, the Union of Expellees, and elected their presiding committee.

The Union of Expellees is headed by Dr. Hans Krüger, a judge from Pomerania and today a member of Dr. Adenauer's CDU Party in the West German Bundestag. The presiding committee includes also Dr. Alfred Gille, a former mayor and since many years the speaker of the East Prussians whose visit to Washington, when he was a member of the Bundestag, is still well remembered here; Wenzel Jaksch, a Sudeten German and Bundestag member of the Social Democratic Party and, during the Hitler regime, a refugee in Great Britain; Dr. Lodgman von Auen, the venerable speaker of the Sudeten Germans; and Reinhold Rehs, another East Prussian and an up-and-coming Bundestag member of the Social Democratic Party.

The wording of both statements reflects the wise moderation that is a noteworthy characteristic of the attitude of the German expellees. It shows a politically mature mind as well as a firm belief in the universal principle of equal justice under the law.

Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the two statements included at the end of my remarks and I hope both statements may have the careful consideration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The statements follow:

I. CONCERNING THE VISIT OF PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

In saluting President Dwight D. Eisenhower we welcome the representative of the freedom-loving American people and the ally of our German democratic commonwealth. We ask him to convey to his people the greetings of the German expellees and their prayer for peace.

More than 12 million Germans, most of them expelled from their homeland east of the Oder and Neisse Rivers and others being refugees from central Germany, are today living in the German Federal Republic; while another 3 million German expellees are among our 17 million enslaved fellow citizens in the Soviet zone of Germany.

After the fighting of World War II ended, a total of 14 million Germans were deprived of their property and deported from their homes. The number of Germans killed in the process of these mass deportations of peoples is larger than the number of German soldiers that died in the course of World War I. But a wall of silence surrounds the 3 million men, women, and children who perished during that expulsion.

Our own fate is witness for the huge sacrifice of life and property which totalitarian madness imposed upon the German people.

Out of the wreckage of the Third Reich a vigorous democratic commonwealth has grown up in West Germany. The effect resulting from Marshall plan aid is evident. The achievement in rebuilding our democracy should have silenced the charge that Germans are unfit to appreciate the blessings of peace and freedom.

Those Germans who were expelled from their homeland in the east have energetically joined in the work of reconstruction. With their large organization the German expellees constitute in West Germany today an element of political stability, of freedom-loving people standing on their own feet. And they have a feeling of close kindship with the 100 million enslaved people in Eastern Europe.

Mr. President, may this visit to Germany give you the assurance that the Federal Republic of Germany is a virile member of the worldwide fellowship of democratic nations. Never again will the German people endanger the peace of the world because we, all of us, on our own body have bitterly experienced the very curse of war and the insanity of totalitarianism.

Almost every fourth citizen of the Federal Republic is one of the people who suffered the fate of being deported from their homeland or of escaping Communist terror. Many millions of our fellow citizens have lived in German cities through the inferno of World War II aerial warfare or have endured long years in prisoner-of-war camps.

None of us would think of war or revenge. What we endeavor to gain, however, is the reunification of the whole of our country and a lasting peace truly realizing for all peoples of Europe the right to freedom and self-determination.

II. To the Polish Nation

On September 1, 20 years will have passed when Hitler, bolstered by his pact with Stalin, attacked Poland and thereby started World War II. This war and its consequences has brought untold misery to Poles as well as to Germans.

Awareness of the evil with which in our minds even the memory of this day is connected admonishes us to sober self-reflection. The world is out of order. Humanity is longing for peace. Peace requires the clarification of German-Polish relations on a basis of law and freedom.

The barrier dividing us today is the twofold problem of the expulsion and the boundaries.

As against official Polish statements and without detriment to our legal rights, we Germans who are expelled from our homeland have time and again emphasized the necessity of seeking a peaceful and agreeable solution of this problem and have expressed our willingness to work toward this end.

The Union of Expelles has repeatedly recommended to our Government to enter into cultural relations with Poland as an initial step toward political conversations. The German-Polish situation cannot be seen in isolation. It is part of the wide area of tensions governed by the forces and interests of global politics of the world's major powers.

To make progress toward solving such a problem, much must depend upon the earnest determination and the good will of both our peoples. A recognition by each one of us of the principle of justice and human dignity is the sound basis for solving our mutual problem.

It is in this spirit that we Germans who are expelled from our homeland are ready to turn a new chapter in the history of our neighborly relations.

APPOINTMENT OF HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI AS U.S. REPRESENTATIVE TO GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF UNITED NATIONS

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to learn recently that my good friend and colleague, CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, has been nominated by President Eisenhower as one of our representatives to the 14th session of the General Assembly of the United Nations which begins September 15, 1959.

CLEM ZABLOCKI has been an able Representative of the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin since 1949. During this period he has reflected great credit upon the people of Wisconsin and, more particularly, his constituents from the southern half of Milwaukee County.

The third ranking member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative ZABLOCKI has exercised excellent judgment and much ability in his work on this important committee. He is now chairman of the Southeast Asia, Far East, and Pacific Subcommittee. Previous to this, he was chairman of the Western Europe Subcommittee. In addition, he has been the chairman of several study missions.

CLEM ZABLOCKI, who is serving his sixth consecutive term in Congress, will take to the United Nations General Assembly a vast store of knowledge accumulated through the years he has served with honor and distinction on the Foreign Affairs Committee.

As the United Nations General Assembly meets for its 14th session, there are a great many grave international problems that will tax the patience and intellect of the various delegations. I believe it is indeed reassuring the CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI will be one of our U.S. delegates to the General Assembly.

I wish to take this occasion to commend President Eisenhower for his appointment of CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI. This is a tribute and an honor he richly deserves, and I know he will serve his country with distinction in his newest assignment.

IRON CURTAIN MADE IN U.S.A.—THE FACTS ABOUT UNITED STATES-CHINA TRAVEL

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, last June in London I talked with H. P. Chou, second secretary of the Chinese People's Republic's diplomatic delegation in the United Kingdom. Our conversation lasted for an hour and 20 minutes and took place at his Embassy on Portland Place. I wanted to find out why the Chinese government, a short time previously, had refused a visa to Averill Harriman and why their journalists had not applied for entrance to the United States.

My dealings, I add, were "contact not contract," to use HUBERT HUMPHREY'S phrasing of the distinction insisted on by the Logan Act. I had long been interested in the proposed exchange of journalists and its bogging down. Recently on the floor of the House I had suggested a mission to China, made up of Members of Congress, journalists, businessmen, and experts, to look into the conditions and potential of trade with the United States.

Mr. Chou told me the Iron Curtain was of U.S. manufacture. He pointed out that they had initiated the idea of newsman exchange. When I returned to the United States I reported my conversation to the Department of State. I asked the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, J. Graham Parsons, if we had made it clear in our negotiations with the Red Chinese that if their individual newsmen applied for visas, it was likely they would be allowed and thus the logjam would be broken so our journalists could get visas for China.

THE BEAM IN OUR EYE

His reply was that he did not know, but that we were not going to beg the Chinese to admit our journalists, something I had not suggested. I asked to see a transcript of the talks in Warsaw and Geneva between United States and Chinese representatives. Later I followed up with a similar request in writing and it was turned down. I went ahead to enlist the aid of the Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service and did some research on these negotiations as reported in the press.

My conclusion, we built the Bamboo Curtain, not China, or as the Bible puts it:

and why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye.

For many years now the American people have been told that if we only can hold out long enough in our policy of building a high wall around China, the Peking government is bound to collapse.

In a speech at the National Press Club last June 16, just at the time he was resigning as Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, Walter S. Robertson said that he did not believe there was much chance of the Peking government collapsing.

This coincides with what our allies and American military men have been saying for years.

Yet we go on pursuing the illusion that by erecting this wall against trade and travel, by barring all exchanges, by refusing to negotiate with the Chinese at a level high enough to count—that by these actions we can bring about the collapse of the regime which is admittedly a cruel and vile police state.

This policy is not going to cause the regime to collapse. It works against our interests. It deprives us and some of our allies of the benefits of trade.

SECONDHAND INFORMATION

It compels us to go to the British or to the Indians or to other foreign sources to find out what is going on in the most populous country in the world.

It prevents Chinese correspondents and students from reporting objectively on the United States.

It prevents the growth of that sort of constructive relationship which can only develop as a result of contacts and direct associations between peoples.

To attain these disadvantages to our own interest we continue to maintain this great wall. In the process we reap another disadvantage: the compelled cohesion of the Communist bloc.

In tracing the sequence of developments in the negotiations relating to this question of travel, it becomes clear that under this administration the State Department has distorted the facts they give to the American public.

One dramatic proof of this distortion appeared recently on a national TV program when the President's press secretary, James Hagerty, stated that we were refusing to let our journalists go to China. He was, accidentally and through ignorance, telling the truth but not in accordance with the position of the Department of State.

As a token concession to the growing pressures in the United States insisting upon increased knowledge of what is going on in China, the Department has validated passports to the authorized representatives of designated news agencies. At the same time the Department has told the American people that the responsibility for the newsmen not getting into China rests with the Chinese who refuse to grant entry visas.

STATE DEPARTMENT DOUBLE-SPEAK

The State Department has not told the American people that the Department knew full well at the time this action was taken that China would not grant visas. China would not grant visas for the plain and understandable reason that the United States has refused to declare openly that the United States, as a matter of policy, would agree in advance to the admission of Chinese correspondents on the basis of reciprocity and equality.

The State Department knew that for 3 years China had beeen urging high-level negotiations on travel, trade, and related questions. The administration could be reasonably sure that so long as we refused to engage in high-level negotiations on this question the Chinese would refuse to issue visas. Publicly the administration deplored China's Bamboo Curtain. Privately the administration welded together its own Iron Curtain.

When pressed on this point, the Department's spokesmen squirmed a bit and said that the immigration laws would not permit advance agreement for the admission of Chinese into the United States. When pressed further on the point, the administration conceded that United States and Soviet citizens travel through agreements and that the Department could exercise its waiver powers under the immigration laws. They then shifted to the tack that the Chinese are free to enter the United States but none have applied. This was the first the Chinese—who are still waiting for the high-level negotiations on the question—had heard of their admissibility.

AN INEFFECTIVE POLICY

It is quite clear that the basic intent of the administration is to continue to maintain its ineffective policy of massive insulation between ourselves and the people of China.

Let us trace the major developments which place the position of our Government in proper perspective.

In the spring of 1955 there was a threat of a Communist invasion of Formosa. Chinese forces were deployed along the coast of Fukien Province facing Formosa. The peoples of Asia feared the outbreak of war.

It was at that time, at the Bandung Conference on April 23 that Premier Chou En-lai made a proposal that the United States and China negotiate. Chou said:

> The Chinese government is willing to sit down and enter into negotiations with the United States to discuss the question of relaxing tension in the Far East, especially in the Formosa area.

This proposal was received by the Afro-Asian heads of state at Bandung as a gesture of reasonableness and in the interest of peace. In Washington, Secretary Dulles had gone to Duck Island and President Eisenhower was in Gettysburg. In their absence, Under Secretary Herbert Hoover, Jr., promptly cabled to Bandung rejecting negotiations.

PLUMMETING PRESTIGE

Within minutes, throughout the Afro-Asian Conference, the prestige of the United States hit rockbottom while Communist China gained stature as a result of its forthright proposal to negotiate our differences. Sir John Kotelawala, Prime Minister of Ceylon, expressed the sentiment, "It is a pity that the United States should have replied to China's offer without thinking."

In the U.S. Senate, Senator George, then chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said:

> When [Chou] says that he is willing to talk, then I think it is time that the high officials of this Government indicate a willingness to talk also * * *. It is never appeasement when a powerful country as the United States indicates a willingness to discuss problems.

Only then the administration belatedly and begrudingly agreed to negotiations on a two-point agenda. Point 1 was the return of Americans interned in China and Chinese in the United States. Point 2 was "other practical matters."

PRISONERS RELEASED

The negotiations opened in Geneva on August 1, 1955, with the United States represented by Ambassador Alexis Johnson and China by Ambassador Wang Ping-nan. On the day before the opening of the conference, China released 11 Americans. Subsequently she has released all but four of the Americans. The United States made provisions whereby any Chinese in the United States wanting to return to China could do so by reporting to the Embassy of India in Washington.

Since the negotiations first opened, China has pressed for negotiations on point 2, "other practical matters," with negotiations at a higher level than the ambassador level. By other matters, China mentioned such questions as removal of restrictions on trade and travel. This was also the intent of the original Bandung proposal.

As time passed the United States refused to consider point 2 until China would renounce the use of force and until all Americans were released. China refused to release all Americans until there was some concrete indication that the United States would discuss point 2—including agreements on trade and travel.

A stalemate resulted. In June 1958 the negotiations were terminated with the reassignment of Ambassador Johnson to Thailand.

FACTS TO BE FACED

On June 30, 1958, China issued a statement declaring that it would consider the Geneva negotiations broken up by the United States unless the U.S. Government resumed the talks within 15 days. On July 14 the United States said that the Chinese demand would be disregarded but that a few days after the 15 day deadline the United States would designate a new representative and propose a resumption of negotiations. In response Peiping said that while the United States had suspended the talks for more than 6 months unilaterally "a few days' delay is not so objectionable"—Peiping, NCNA, July 15, 1958.

It is not likely that the administration has intentionally used the remaining Americans in China as pawns in this insulation game it has been playing. In terms of results, however, I do believe that if our Government had proceeded with high-level negotiations on trade and travel in accord with the initial negotiation proposals, and the hopes of many Asians, many of our European allies and many Americans—there is reason to believe that the remaining five—one has been added—Americans would now be in the United States.

There is also good reason to believe that if we had concluded agreements on trade and travel the subsequent climate would have been such that by now we could have proceeded to consideration of such tension-producing, war-breeding issues as the reunification of Korea and the permanent status of Formosa.

Instead, in 1958 the Chinese threat to Formosa was again rekindled. Again at the instigation of Premier Chou En-lai negotiations were reopened, this time in Warsaw with the United States represented by Ambassador Jacob Beam. Again the United States opposes discussions at a higher level than the ambassadorial level. Again we are insisting upon perpetuating the massive wall of insulation between ourselves and the people of China. And at the same time, the State Department tries to convey the impression that China is responsible for refusing to grant visas to our newsmen.

CHRONOLOGY OF TRAVEL ISSUE

The following chronology indicates major positions taken by the United States and China with respect to travel:

On November 1, 1955, the State Department announced that it would validate no passports for travel to China until all Americans had been released. The Department stated that it could not expose others to the dangers until China had lived up to its existing commitments—New York Times, November 1, 1955.

On June 12, 1956, Ambassador Wang Ping-nan, breaking the secrecy of the Geneva talks, said that he had agreed to a meeting of Foreign Ministers within 60 days. On the same date the State Department said that negotiations could not be shifted to the Foreign Minister level so long as Communist China refused to make a meaningful renunciation of force and failed to return 13 Americans still held in prison.

On August 7, 1956, Communist China invited 15 U.S. newsmen for a 1-month visit. On the same date the State Department rejected the invitation stating that "it continues to be the policy of the State Department not to issue passports." The reasons stated were: First, that the Department could not protect passport holders if they were in Red China; and second, American citizens remained imprisoned—Department of State Bulletin, volume 35, page 314; New York Times, August 7, 1956.

On August 12, 1956, Chou En-lai again invited American newsmen "in order that they might see what China really was like"—New York Times, August 12, 1956. On August 24 President Eisenhower expressed "full concurrence" in the ban on passports to newsmen—New York Times, August 21, 1956. On August 24, 1956, China ruled that it would not admit newsmen who were not in possession of U.S. passports. This ended the plans of those newsmen who intended to go to China without passports—New York Times, August 24, 1956.

On September 1, 1956, President Eisenhower stated that no one would rather send newsmen to China than he would, but it could not be allowed as long as China continued to hold American citizens as hostages—New York Times, September 1, 1956. On November 28, 1956, Premier Chou En-lai repeated his invitation to American newsmen to visit China—New York Times, September 1, 1956. On January 20, 1957, Ambassador Johnson stated that he had been using U.S. permission to travel as a bargaining point in attempting to obtain the release of 10 Americans still held in China—New York Times, January 20, 1957.

President Eisenhower said, on January 23, 1957, that he would not consider changing U.S. policy as long as China continued to hold American prisoners—New York Times, January 24, 1957. On January 27, 1957, Chou En-lai said that he would like "everybody to visit China"—New York Times, January 27, 1957.

ADAMANT DULLES

At a news conference on February 5, 1957, Secretary Dulles said that "newsmen and others are prevented from going to China because China uses the illegal detention of Americans as a means of pressure to accomplish its own ends. If Americans were released policy might be changed." He added that the issuance of passports to a regime which is not recognized is something which is never done even if the newsmen were to waive protection—Department of State Bulletin, volume 36, pages 300–305. Secretary Dulles further stated that Red China seeks to trade the release of Americans for U.S. permission for the newsmen to visit China—New York Times, February 6, 1957.

On February 21, 1957, news correspondent Arthur Krock published a new statement of the State Department's position. This listed the following reasons for the ban: First, Chinese blackmail; second, Wang Ping-nan's agreement to free prisoners as yet unfulfilled; third, signs of U.S. weakness weaken our allies; fourth, the ban not applied exclusively to newsmen but to missionaries, scholars, and so forth; fifth, the ban is not a violation of freedom of the press; sixth, there is no issue involved of the nonimpartiality of the newsmen; seventh, the President's proclamation of a national emergency is still in effect banning trade and travel; eighth, China refuses to renounce force in the Formosa area—having no diplomatic relations, the United States could not protect its citizens; ninth, a lawless regime is trying to win respectability; tenth, constructive action by Peiping will bring a review of policy, but not before—New York Times, February 6, 1957.

On March 5, 1957, a new reason was advanced. Secretary Dulles stated that Red China is trying to reestablish cultural intercourse with the neighboring countries; that this is dangerous to them and the United States must not set a bad example—Department of State Bulletin, volume 36, page 488.

MURPHY'S FIVE REASONS

In testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 2, 1957, Under Secretary of State Robert Murphy said that travel to China was banned for the following reasons:

First. A state of unresolved conflict exists. The national emergency proclaimed at the outbreak of the Korean attack is still in effect banning all trade and financial transactions; in time of war, travel in enemy territory is denied to U.S. citizens. In the present state of national emergency, travel is similarly denied.

Second. Red China constitutes a threat to Formosa and refuses to renounce force in the Formosa area.

Third. Since the United States does not recognize the Chinese Communist regime, diplomatic and consular protection cannot be extended—they still hold hostages.

Fourth. In their lawless acts the regime has cynically disregarded world opinion. Now they need respectability. One of the requirements of such respectability is trade and cultural relations with the United States.

Fifth. Since eight U.S. citizens are still held prisoners we would be yielding to a form of blackmail—Department of State Bulletin, volume 36, page 665.

On April 24, 1957, Secretary Dulles told a news conference that the question was whether "we can have a passport policy which will permit responsible newsgathering and at the same time not permit a general influx of Americans into Communist China." He said that the Department would be receptive to concrete suggestions.

A LINE THAT COULDN'T BE DRAWN

After repeating the earlier reasons for opposing travel, Secretary Dulles discussed the difficulties of drawing a line between newsmen and other persons desirous of entering China. Then Secretary Dulles declared:

> We have no intention of inviting Communist Chinese newspaper people to come to this country * * * since any such passports would have to be issued by a regime that we do not recognize as a government, it would not be practical to give a visa for such people who had credentials only stemming from the Chinese Communist regime to come to this country (Department of State Bulletin, May 13, 1957, p. 268).

In evaluating Mr. Dulles' remarks, the New York Times pointed out that some of the correspondents at the news conference "felt that Mr. Dulles was making such an official issue of the question that, if he insisted on official ground rules the Chinese Communists would withdraw the invitation and thus complete the ban"—New York Times, April 24, 1957.

A SUDDEN CHANGE OF POLICY—APPARENTLY

Against this background—having stated the firm policy that validated passports would not be granted until all American prisoners were returned; nor while the trading with the enemy act remained effective; nor until the Peiping regime was officially recognized; nor while the Korean emergency continued to exist—and having unequivocally declared that "we have no intention of inviting Communist Chinese newspaper people to come to this country." on August 22, 1957, the State Department then proceeded to authorize 24 American newsmen to go to China—Department of State Bulletin, volume 37, page 420; New York Times August 23, 1957.

Evidently the Department found its own argument unpersuasive. The response of the Peking government was outright rejection. The Peoples Daily, the official organ, declared that "the decision of the Department of State ignores the principle of reciprocity and is completely unacceptable—Jen Min Jih Pao August 26, 1957.

On August 28, 1957, Secretary Dulles said that the United States would consider the application of any Chinese newsman on its merits but would not give blanket permission to a group—New York Times, August 28, 1957.

Premier Chou En-lai responded on September 7, 1957, by extending a new welcome to Americans to visit China but only on a reciprocal basis—New York Times, September 7, 1957. On the following day he again called for a reciprocal exchange—New York Times, September 7, 1957. On September 12 Ambassador Johnson rejected a proposal of Ambassador Wang Ping-nan for a reciprocal exchange of newsmen—Department of State Bulletin, volume 37, page 33; New York Times, September 13, 1957.

In commenting on this rejection, the Chinese newspaper Chin jih hsin wen stated:

> On September 12 during the meeting of the Chinese and American Ambassadors, the Chinese Ambassador proposed to the U.S. Ambassador the exchange of newsmen of the two countries on the basis of reciprocity. Johnson replied that this could not be considered because of U.S. immigration restrictions. But this violates the principle of reciprocity and obstructs the interchange of personnel of the two countries. The Chinese proposal of the interchange of newsmen is issued on the principle of reciprocity; it is practicable and is in consonance with the desires of the Chinese and American peoples to promote closer relations between them. The American refusal to accept this proposal signifies the fact that the United States has no intention to take this step to fulfill the desires of the Chinese and American peoples. (Peiping, "People's Handbook," 1958, p. 435.)

WHY NOT EQUALITY AND RECIPROCITY?

Since that date the Chinese position has remained basically the same. On December 12, 1957, Wang Ping-nan proposed a comprehensive exchange and assistance agreement "on the basis of equality and reciprocity." This was rejected. As for the more recent shifts in the United States position, these have been within the framework of a continued policy of forestalling travel. On April 23, 1959, the State Department reversed its earlier tactic by challenging Communist China to have some of its newsmen individually apply for permission to enter the United States. The Department was "prepared to consider recommending to the Attorney General a waiver" of laws preventing visits by Communist Chinese.

This, however, did not satisfy China's insistence upon an advance agreement based on clear equality and reciprocity. The administration has continued to refuse to validate passports to applicants other than the authorized newsmen, including the applications of Associate Justice William O. Douglas and several Members of Congress.

Far from begging, our policy has been to sandbag the newsmen exchange program while pretending piously that the blame for failure should be placed on the Chinese.

However defensible the administration's position against allowing passports to our newsmen, and it was not entirely unreasonable, the passports were given to them.

The Secretary states publicly that if a Chinese newsman will apply, the Secretary will recommend a waiver of the Walter-McCarran Act to the Attorney General. If the Secretary can do it in 1 case, he can do it in 21, 31, or 41 cases on the basis of reciprocity and equality. Why does he not?

Whatever their record in other negotiations, and it is bad, the Chinese have pushed this program and their request for equality and reciprocity is undeniably one we should grant, first, because it is fair that we do, and second, because it will ultimately help the cause of peace if their newsmen and others see for themselves this land of ours.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'BRIEN of New York (at the request of Mr. DOLLINGER), until further notice, on account of illness.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Dedication of Stamps Commemorating the 100th Anniversary of the Petroleum Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARROLL D. KEARNS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following talk made by Postmaster General Arthur E. Summerfield at the dedication ceremonies of the 4-cent petroleum industry centennial commemorative stamp at Titusville, Pa., August 27, 1959:

In my service as Postmaster General, no official act could give me greater pleasure than to dedicate this stamp commemorating the 100th anniversary of the petroleum industry.

The American people have great reason to be indebted to this industry. It has supplied most of the power that has made the American standard of living possible.

Certainly we in the Post Office Department can see most vividly the contribution this great industry has made to the progress of America.

The improvement of the postal service has depended upon the constant advance of this industry. The development of diesel oil for the railroads greatly speeded our transcontinental service. The development of better gasolines for trucks and airplanes was vital to the Post Office's ability to keep pace with the needs of our people.

Recently the fuel this industry has made possible for jet aircraft has enabled us to give the better and faster service we should render in these times.

But the industry does not stop with this, nor do we. The industry has developed fuels to power mighty missiles—and we have carried out our first experiment in missile mail. We shall look to the petroleum industry in the future to provide power that will enable mail-carrying missiles to speed communications from this continent to all parts of the earth.

In the light of today's progress, it is difficult to believe that it was only 100 years ago that Col. Edwin L. Drake completed the first oil well here in this historic city of Titusville.

It is not difficult, however, to understand the dedication, the sacrifice, the courage, and the tenacity with which Colonel Drake met his challenge. It was a fitting beginning for a great enterprise that has been marked throughout this century by courage, dedication, and success.

The American people, I am sure, applaud the words of a testimonial to Colonel Drake by his contemporaries:

"Edwin L. Drake was the man who first bored for oil, and by his genius and indomitable perseverance, produced the cheapest illuminator of the age, multiplying the wealth of the world, adding to the list of human industries and contributing to the comfort and happiness of mankind."

How very apt, as well, are the words of the centennial slogan of the petroleum industry—"Born in Freedom, Working for Progress."

The oil industry not only was born in freedom, but has been a vital guardian of American freedom through all the years that have ensued. It has been a basic strength in war, a propellant of economic progress—a builder of higher standards of living—in peace.

We look to this stamp as more than a commemorative symbol. With more than 120 million stamps to be issued, it will go throughout the world as a reminder of what can be achieved by the combination of free enterprise and the vision and courage and effort of dedicated men.

It will serve as a worldwide tribute to all who have brought the oil industry to its present greatness—and to its leaders who are moving with confidence to meet the challenge of the future.

It is a great privilege to inaugurate this commemorative stamp, here on the site of the oil industry's birth. This stamp, above all, bears the best wishes of the American people for the second century of oil and the contribution it will make to better life for all the peoples of the earth.

General Accounting Office Report

OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to examine the recent General Accounting Office report on the Air Force purchase of the Wherry housing projects, and it is my belief that this report is misleading and based on false premises.

The report not only artfully avoids the principle question necessarily arising in cases of this sort—namely, did the Air Force receive full value for the dollars spent—but, in fact, it also chastises the Air Force apparently for following the Department of Defense directive calling for direct negotiation rather than condemnation procedures. At no time does the report consider what the results would have been had the Air Force resorted to condemnation of the property.

Considering these points in reviewing the case of particular interest to us—that of Barksdale Air Force Base—we find that the Wherry housing units there had been completed in 1951 and 1952 at an approximate cost of $9,164 a unit. This project consists of 692 two- and three-bedroom housing units for airmen and officers, 544 of which were completed in December 1951 and 148 in February 1952. The original estimate of replacement cost was $6,331,699, or approximately $9,164 per unit. The Air Force, we find, paid a total of $6,256,199, or $9,039 per unit. But the same project if built in 1958 would have cost $8,231,209, or $11,913 per unit. These prices are based on leading surveys which show that a 30-percent increase in construction costs occurred between January 1952 and January 1958 for similar areas. This would have resulted, therefore, in an increase of about $2,850 more per unit. In addition, the owners had even put an additional $100,000 investment into their houses several years after completion in order to improve the electrical systems.

It appears to me, then, that the Air Force received full value for every dollar spent when it paid for the Barksdale and other projects at 1951–52 prices. The Air Force carefully inspected these projects before acquisition. I don't believe there is anyone who could buy real estate today for the price it was worth 7 years ago.

Now, had the Air Force not negotiated for the property or if the owners had not accepted the Air Force offers, the Air Force would have had to resort to condemning the property. It would have been necessary to pay today's full value since a court is concerned with the present value of property and not whether a builder will be making a profit from the sale. The results of a number of condemnation trials in connection with disposal of Wherry projects are shown in the attached chart. From these figures, it appears that the results in the courts have been much in excess of the maximum formula price which in turn is limited to original FHA replacement costs. The Constitution requires that just compensation be paid when a property is appropriated and nowhere does the question of profit over original investment enter into the determination of just compensation for condemned property.

The owners apparently were satisfied with the price paid them, preferring to settle for the lower 1952 in order to obtain their money immediately, thereby avoiding a wait of several years for the conclusion of a condemnation action with all of its subsequent expenses.

By this record of negotiated acquisitions as against acquisition by condemnation, the Air Force carried out the congressional intent of the Wherry legislation as well as that of the recent Armed Services Special Subcommittee—that is, to negotiate up to the maximum price, if necessary, before going into condemnation proceedings.

Not to have negotiated where possible, therefore, would have meant ignoring congressional policy and executive responsibility to buy the Wherry projects and improve them where necessary to bring them up to current public quarters standards—a goal having priority with the Air Force at this time. Millions of dollars have been lost in training personnel at great expense only to have them leave the service because of inadequate living conditions. The Cordiner Committee, General LeMay, and other high officials have long recognized the fact that a professional Air Force capable of meeting today's defense needs cannot be established if families are required to live in public quarters not commensurate with their quarters allowance.

This goal will be helped toward realization, it is hoped, by the Wherry acquisition program as well as by the Capehart housing program now underway.

Poland Stands Today as a Symbol of Courage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, as we pause to look back two decades to the day that Hitler released his panzers to plunge across the borders of Poland to kill and to plunder, we should be mindful that the United States has a close and intimate relation with the brave people of that freedom loving nation which dates back nearly 200 years to the time when the founders of this Nation were fighting for their own freedom against a powerful empire. A number of Poland's great soldiers volunteered their services and fought with the colonial army to victory, sharing all the bitter hardships of America's war for freedom.

It saddens our heart to look back on the brutal and inhuman treatment suffered by the people of Poland, first at the hands of the Nazis and later the Russians. Since the end of World War II, Poland has lived under the yoke of the Communist, but the spirit of her people, their longing for freedom is as evident today as it was two centuries ago. The Communist masters in Moscow have found that their most brutal methods have been unable to suppress this desire for freedom and today of all the nations behind the Iron Curtain, Poland remains the most independent and there the fire of freedom burns brightest, 20 years since her people have known freedom.

Poland stands today as a symbol of courage, a nation that refuses to let freedom die.

Farewell to Walter Lee

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, it was with mixed feelings that I recently learned of the impending retirement at the conclusion of the current session of Walter Lee, the very able legislative assistant of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Claims. I am happy for him that he has the opportunity to retire and to take it easy after his many years of service on Capitol Hill. I am sad that he will no longer be around to assist us in his very courteous and efficient manner.

It was my pleasure to know Walter since I first came to Congress in 1951. He has been most cooperative whenever I would call on him. His advice in connection with legislation has always been straightforward, sincere, and wise. I shall miss his good counsel in these matters. Somehow Capitol Hill will just not be the same without Walter Lee.

In his well-earned and well-deserved retirement, I wish him and his family many years of good health and happiness. May his years be long and his memory of his many friends on Capitol Hill always pleasant.

The Pentagon Book Ban

OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we live in a time of world crisis when the life and death issues of peace or war are debated in the Halls of Congress, the press, and public forums throughout the country. The new personal diplomacy of the Eisenhower administration and the forthcoming exchange of visits between Mr. Khrushchev and Mr. Eisenhower signify the intensity of the search for peace.

In these critical times there is need for basic data and the informed judgment of experts to help the American people find the right road to peace. I have tried, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to bring to the Congress and the American people the basic facts of nuclear radiation—the effects of radiation from bomb testing as well as the nuclear damage from hypothetical mass attack. As chairman of the Military Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations, I have tried to do the same in the missile field—bring together in one authoritative document the basic facts of the missile programs which support our strategy of deterrence and defense.

We need more information, Mr. Speaker, not less, to put into the crucible of national debate which will mold the American policy for survival and peace. Therefore, it is with great concern that I note the Department of Defense decision to ban a book by Gen. Thomas S. Power, who heads our Strategic Air Command.

This Pentagon book banning is a shortsighted policy. Granted that there may be some technical problems about books and articles written by Government officials, military and otherwise—technical problems concerning royalties, copyright, and the like—it is vastly more important for the Congress and the public to have the benefit of the seasoned judgment and experience of men like General Power.

General Power's book was written to help the American people understand better the issues of war and peace in the nuclear-missile age. The book analyzes the revolutionary impact of nuclear bombs and missiles on military strategy, the nature of the enemy threat, problems of deterrence, the implications of all-out and limited war, the vital role of civil defense in deterrence, and other important matters.

The Air Force has approved this book for publication. A publisher is waiting the word to put the book into print. General Power has given up any financial returns that may be derived from the sale of this book.

Mr. Murray Snyder, Assistant Secretary of Defense—Public Affairs—has decided that this book should be withheld from publication. His office issued a press release to this effect, although neither General Power nor the Secretary of the Air Force were informed directly beforehand that a decision to withhold the book had been made.

I presume that Secretary of Defense McElroy has approved Mr. Snyder's action. If so, I believe that the Secretary had better reconsider this action and permit General Power's book to be published.

Secretary McElroy should recognize that book banning, like book burning, is a vicious and futile policy which does no credit to a free nation. The right of the people to learn and to understand should not yield to bureaucratic policy which conflicts with that right.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, August 31, 1959, at page 17357, there is a list of 15 books by high-ranking military officers written while on active duty. I notice among them "Crusade in Europe," by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, written while he was Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army during the period 1945–48; the book was published in 1948. This book has been highly rated by scholars and commentators on World War II. It was an important work by the general in command of the allied invasion forces. The American people are the better off for its publication.

I believe the same could be said about General Power's book. I have not had access to the book, although I am familiar generally with the subject matter of which it treats. I may not even agree with certain things General Power says and, doubtless, he would not subscribe altogether to points recently made by my subcommittee in its report on organization and management of missile programs. But General Power has an important message for the American people. He should be allowed to convey that message. I hope that the Secretary of Defense will reconsider the ill-advised and unwarranted book-banning decision.

Levering Will Hold Conferences in District

OF
HON. ROBERT W. LEVERING
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, when I was elected to Congress last fall, I resolved that I would strive in every way possible to maintain a close contact with the people of the 17th Congressional District of Ohio, who elected me to represent them.

Since then, I have made regular radio speeches to my people, filling them in on the problems of Government which I think are important. I have circulated a weekly newsletter to the newspapers of my district, so that the editors and the people would be able to understand the issues and the many views relating to them. I have had personal contact with thousands of members of the public from my district. I have corresponded with other thousands.

This year, as did my predecessor in the past, I am arranging a series of meetings in the courthouses of the seven counties in my district, and I am urging members of the public to come to these meetings and to talk over any and all subjects they choose. It is my thought that only by personally contacting the people I serve, can I do the best possible job for them in the Congress of the United States. I will be in the courtrooms of the seven county courthouses from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. each weekday.

Here is the schedule:

Friday, September 25, Ashland, Ashland County.

Monday, September 28, Mansfield, Richland County.

Tuesday, September 29, Mount Vernon, Knox County.

Wednesday, September 30, Delaware, Delaware County.

Thursday, October 1, Newark, Licking County.

Friday, October 2, Coshocton, Coshocton County.

Monday, October 5, Millersburg, Holmes County.

I not only welcome visitors at these conferences, I urge individuals, regardless of political party or how they may have voted in the past, to come to see me. I am striving to represent all the people of the 17th District, regardless of their beliefs about any political or legislative issue, and I know that it is of great help for a Congressman to talk over personal, national, and international problems with the people at home.

No appointments are necessary. I hope to see a large number of persons. The discussions can help me to serve them better, and it can help them to understand my problems in striving to do the best possible job for all of the people of my district.

Maj. Gen. William P. Fisher

OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, it has been announced that Maj. Gen. William P. Fisher, director of Air Force legislative liaison, will be leaving in a few weeks to assume command of the Eastern Air Force Military Air Transport Service.

General Fisher has brought great ability and outstanding results to this complex assignment. He has been a persuasive advocate of our defense program and he has done much to keep alive the cordial relationship which exists between the Congress and the Department of the Air Force.

I wish General Fisher his greatest success in his new assignment and I know that my colleagues will join me in welcoming General Fisher's successor as Air Force director of legislative liaison, Maj. Gen. Thomas C. Musgrave, Jr.

Demands on the Federal Treasury

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. Y. BERRY
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, one of the rough detours on the road to the adjournment of Congress is the controversial problem of financing the highway program. Pressure has been built up from the States, the construction people, and the material suppliers for a bond issue to finance the bulk of the cost and then a diversion of the excise tax on new cars and parts.

The people demand a program of "pay as you spend or do not spend." The President has recommended an increase in the gas tax of 1½ cents per gallon to "pay as you spend." The committees of Congress have been wrestling with the problem for months. Each time they add two and two, they come up with the disgusting figure of four and then they must go back and start all over. Surely if they wait long enough, Members will become so anxious to get home that they will buy a set of figures that do not add up.

The problem presented is as old as the philosophy of planned spending. The pattern has been followed many, many times, and each time it has produced the desired results. Is there any reason to expect it will not this time? Yes, the garment is new, but the pattern is old.

THE PATTERN

A few years ago the States were suffering financial difficulty with mounting highway traffic. There was increasing demand from the people for more and better roads. The States had levied close to their limits. Although under the Federal highway program the Federal Government matched 60 percent, the States could not meet their 40 percent without tax increases. This they were reluctant to do.

It was becoming serious when someone came up with a plan—an interstate "defense" highway program where the Federal Government would match 90 percent and the State only 10 percent. The State groups reasoned that if they could just get the Federal Government to build one good superhighway across every State, this would relieve the pressure on State governments.

In order to insure that each State would be given at least one good cross State superhighway, the plan provided for the connecting of principal industrial cities. It was labelled a "defense measure," and to sugar-coat the pill, a separate fund was established so the program could be sold as a "pay as you build" program. Certainly Congress would buy that one.

It was neatly wrapped and tied with a lovely "defense" ribbon. Congress bought it. The thing Congress failed to do, however, was to put any brakes on the law. Almost before it was unwrapped, the spenders had their plan in action and construction was accelerated on an antirecession basis. What happened? The same thing that happens to every program which is shifted to the Federal Government—they ran out of gas.

Anyone who could add two and two and come up with a total figure of four would know that with such an outlay of money, the program would go in the hole—$241 million by June 30 next year and $2.1 billion by June 30, 1962. It did, and the program is bankrupt.

However, anyone who understands Congress also knows that it is only necessary to get the ball started rolling downhill—then when the crisis comes, if they can pour enough telegrams into Washington, Congress will surrender and mortgage the future of the Nation to secure the continuance of the program.

The oil companies are stirring up the people against a gas-tax increase to pay for the increased cost, the contractors and suppliers who are caught in the middle are pleading for help—so Congress goes into the Treasury, either directly or indirectly, and the whole ball of wax is added onto the national debt.

As I have indicated, the garment is new, but the pattern is as old as the New Deal philosophy. Add it to the national debt. Paper and green ink are cheap—so we print more bonds and more money. The farmer and miner whose prices do not fluctuate, the retired people on pensions, and those on fixed incomes must pay the bill as these cheaper, inflated dollars—the most vicious of all forms of taxation—pile up.

Yes—the garment is new, but the pattern is old. Local and State governments shift the burden of their obligations to the Federal Government because they do not have the courage to levy additional taxes on themselves. Another thing, legal or constitutional debt limits prevent them from going further into debt, whereas the Federal Government has no effective debt limitation. The national debt limit can be moved up each time Congress spends in excess of national income.

ANOTHER GARMENT, SAME PATTERN

Three years ago the cities were having difficulty doing all the things they wanted to do without increasing the tax burden on the local taxpayer, so they decided to shift more of their burden to Washington.

The Leagues of Municipalities worked out a plan and sold it to the sportmen's groups. The sportsmen carried the ball and the leagues simply ran the interference.

On the basis that clean fish need clean water, they attached an amendment to a simple bill extending the Anti-Stream-Pollution Act, to provide that the Federal Government would make grants to cities for the building of sewage systems.

Sponsors pledged that it would be for only 2 years and cost only $100 million. This year we hit the crisis—too many cities needed help—they needed twice as much for five times as long—and, of course, will get it.

What business does Congress have heaping the city sewers on top of the national debt when all that is needed is a little exercise of the police powers of the State? The answer is "None." It had no business going into this purely local governmental function in the first place, but if it did wish to take this function over, then certainly a tax should have been levied which would raise the money to pay this additional cost.

The purpose was to shift the burden of paying for the sewer system at Podunk from the people of Podunk to the people of the Nation. There it could be added to the national debt.

ANOTHER GARMENT

School districts across the Nation have been having great difficulty meeting the increased cost of school operation without placing the burden too heavily upon the neighbors who pay the taxes. The educators have been looking to the Federal Government for financing on the theory that with Federal money the Federal wage scale could be adopted in the schools. The boards of education have been looking to the Federal Government as money from Washington would relieve the pressure on them, pressure from teaching staffs on one side and pressure from the taxpayer on the other. Another thing, the districts must live within legal debt limits, the Federal Government does not.

The National Education Association with a strong lobby in Washington has sold the "free money" plan to the State associations and the parent-teachers groups across the Nation. Their bill, known as the Murray-Metcalf bill, has been reported by the House Education and Labor Committee and is now before the House Rules Committee.

The bill would cost over a billion dollars annually in the beginning, but will cost many, many billions in a few years. It makes no provision for financing, no provision for increased tax levies. It anticipates adding the cost of educating the children of the Nation onto the national debt. Federal control of education would be serious, but increasing the national debt in this manner and further "watering down" the already deflated dollar would be much more serious.

THE PROBLEM

Senator BYRD of Virginia recently reported that by 1957 Congress has provided 57 different grant-in-aid laws, all of them assisting local groups and local governments in financing projects and programs that are fundamentally the obligation of such local governmental units.

The problem has grown up primarily because individuals, communities, local governing boards and legislatures desire these many improvements, but lack the courage to levy the taxes necessary to provide payment for them. In addition, many States have a constitutional debt limit and local governments have either a constitutional or legal debt limit which prevents them from further increasing their bonded indebtedness. The Federal Government has no effective debt limit. The result is that they look to the Federal Government to finance all of these program. Congress, having no greater stamina than the local governing boards, passes these grant-in-aid laws with the result that each year Federal expenditures increase, the national debt goes up, the value of the dollar goes down, interest rates on cheap money go up, and the whole ball of wax gets bigger and more explosive.

OTHER DEMANDS

It is not only the States and local governmental units that are coming to the Federal Treasury for help. In recent years, friendly foreign nations have learned that when they are short of funds for improvements, for unbalanced budgets, for relief purposes, for defense, and for their many other needs, they, too, can come to Uncle Sam with a package tied in a defense ribbon and have their needs added to the national debt through the foreign aid appropriations.

NEEDED ACTION

How can these raids on the Treasury with resultant additions to the national debt be stopped? The voters can elect Members to Congress who have the courage to say "No." This, of course, is only temporary as the pendulum swings forth and back each two years. They can, however, effectively and permanently halt any additions to the national debt by adopting a simple constitutional amendment.

If Congress were prohibited from enacting any bill which provides for spending any money in excess of the national income for that year without incorporating in such bill a tax levy to raise sufficient revenue to pay for such spending, it would effectively prohibit further Federal indebtedness.

I have introduced a resolution providing for a constitutional amendment which would require that every appropriation bill contain either a certificate that this expenditure, when considered with the whole, will not exceed the anticipted revenues, or that such bill contain within its provisions a tax measure sufficient to meet such expenditure.

I am convinced this is the only method by which increased demands for federally financed programs can be reduced. I am convinced this is the only way deficit spending can be stopped. I am convinced this is the only way a balanced budget can be effected and the national debt can be limited.

While this amendment is an absolute must, if the financial integrity of the Nation is to be preserved, it does not do the whole job. There is another hole in the dike that must be plugged.

FOREIGN AID

At the present time Uncle Sam is being called upon not only to defend but to finance the nations of the entire free world. This would not be so serious if such financing was being paid as we spend. The fact is, however, it, too, is being added to the national debt.

This picture requires a different frame. Uncle Sam cannot levy a direct tax upon our free world friends requiring them to contribute toward the cost of their own and our defense, or to repay our Treasury for the contributions we are making toward bolstering their budgets, contributing to their relief load, their internal development, and so forth, but he can and must require some assistance from them to the American taxpayer.

We cannot levy a tax on the manufacture and shipment of their products being used in trade with other nations, but we can require them to assist our taxpayer and we can require them to help us keep our budget in balance in spite of our great defense outlay, by levying an import tax upon the goods they import into this country. Trade with us is vital to them. The import tax could be based not so much upon the commodity as upon the cost to us of defending and financing that particular country.

THE ALTERNATIVE

The present trend must be halted if national bankruptcy is to be averted. The present national debt is equivalent to a first mortgage on the property of every family in the Nation of $6,400. The deficit of the last 2 years of $16 billion means $360 for each family.

The present program and present policy is rapidly moving this Nation toward the fearful situation of where a housewife must take a market basketful of money to the grocery store to buy a purse full of groceries.

Osceola Mills, Pa., Celebrates Its 100th Birthday

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, highlighted by congratulatory messages from President Eisenhower and Gov. David L. Lawrence of Pennsylvania together with introduction of a concurrent resolution by the Congress of the United States extending felicitations and expressing appreciation for the century of splendid services rendered to the Nation by its citizens, the Borough of Osceola Mills in Clearfield County, Pa., observed the 100th anniversary of its founding the week of August 23–29. During that period many former residents responded to the welcome home invitation and returned to join in the centennial festivities.

First named Osceola and then changed to Osceola Mills to avoid a conflict in names and because of numerous sawmills in the area, the town was established in 1859 and incorporated as a borough in 1864. Located on the banks of Moshannon Creek—now the dividing line between Centre and Clearfield Counties—like many other communities in central Pennsylvania the town was named for an Indian.

The community was named for Osceola, the famous war chief of the Seminoles, a Florida tribe, after he, his family and tribe had been persecuted by the whites. Chief Osceola was born in Florida about 1813 during the War of 1812. In 1835 his wife was carried off as a slave, after which Osceola and his tribe waged a relentless war against the whites for 2 years with varying success. He was finally taken prisoner by treachery and confined at Fort Moultrie where he died 2 years later. Twenty-two years later the present town of Osceola Mills was named Osceola in honor of the Seminole war chief whose daring and ability won him nationwide sympathy.

Other Indian names in the area including Bald Eagle, Moshannon, Warriors Mark, and Snow Shoe were taken from Delaware, Shawnee, and Corn Planter Indians that lived in the area prior to and after the coming of the white settlers.

History records that the first settlement in Osceola Mills was made by a family named Winter followed by Daniel Hoffman who cleared a piece of land near the junction of Pruner and Coal streets.

Among the oldest settlers in the Osceola Mills area was Valentine Flegal who bought extensive tracts of land in 1800. He was a local minister and held services at Stumptown in 1815. The Stumptown church was later used as a school for more than 80 years and in 1951 after having been abandoned as a school, it was again made into a church where Free Methodist services are held each Sunday. Located across the road from the old Goss Cemetery, another famous landmark, the church was among many points of interest during the centennial celebration.

Osceola Mills was visited by a devastating fire on May 20, 1875, that almost wholly destroyed the town, inflicting property losses of over $1½ million. Despite the fact that all inhabitants were made homeless the residents of the stricken community with the aid of neighboring towns soon recovered from such a staggering blow and from the ruins there arose a new and more beautiful community.

Clearfield County, which was among the principal lumbering areas in central Pennsylvania, is noted for its production of bituminous coal. However, because of the lack of railroad transportation, development of the coal industry was retarded.

It is recorded that about 1830 a mine was opened on what was known as the Goss Farm in Decatur Township, and coal was hauled on wagons to Spruce Creek. The transportation of coal by such crude methods naturally amounted to very small tonnage. It was not until 1846 with the opening of the Tyrone and Clearfield Railroad to Osceola Mills and Philipsburg that the real development of the coal industry in Clearfield County commenced. Prior to that time not one pound of coal was shipped by rail from Clearfield County. In fact, the first shipment of coal from Clearfield County was made during lumbering days when coal was loaded in what were called "Arks" and floated down the Susquehanna River to Lock Haven and Williamsport as early as 1822.

Today, Clearfield County bituminous coal is known throughout the Nation and abroad and it is of interest on the occasion of the Osceola Mills centennial celebration to recall the important part that Moshannon Valley community has played in the coal production records of Clearfield County.

As the residents of Osceola Mills reminisced on this eventful occasion, they were reminded that the community, in addition to lumbering, farming, railroading and coal mining, for a number of years harbored a tannery built in 1873. Other sources of employment include a modern brick plant, and some smaller industries. Railroading has been prominent in the industrial life of the town as evidenced by a large railroad yard which was located in Osceola Mills because it was situated at the junction of the Moshannon branch with the mainline of the Tyrone & Clearfield Railroad, which years ago was absorbed by the Pennsylvania Railroad system.

To commemorate the community's 100th birthday, the Osceola Mills Centennial Committee was formed headed by Chief Burgess John Redding as president and general chairman, with Andrew Tocimak, secretary; Herman Hirsh, treasurer; and William B. McFeeters, publicity chairman. The finance committee was comprised of Neal Baney, Gordon Kephart, Lee Kennedy, George Stranko, and Justin O'Brien. With president John Redding serving as a member of the steering committee, the other members were: Robert Heath, George Mandell, Russell Olenick, Herman Hirsh, John McDonald, Charles Mostyn, Fred Brown, Eugene Danko, Earl Thomas, Norman Stevens, Arthur Bush, and John Timchak.

Following is the week-long centennial program featuring a parade each evening at 7:30 p.m.:

Sunday, August 23: Religious day with special services in all churches and a centennial evening vesper service in the park at 7 p.m. at which time Rev. Ira Duvall, of Curwensville, Pa., former pastor of the Methodist Church was the speaker.

Monday, August 24: Veterans and Defense Day softball game, 6 p.m., merchants versus Little League officials; military parade, 7 p.m., featuring 2d Army Headquarters Band from Fort George G. Meade, Md.; 3d Reconnaissance Squadron, 104th Armored Cavalry; representative units of the U.S. Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force; fly-over by Navy and Air Force jetplanes; program at memorial stadium 8 p.m.; concert by 2d Army Headquarters Band; address by Congressman JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, captain, U.S. Navy Reserve; Marine Corps attack on fortified bunker position by 34th Infantry Company, U.S. Marine Corps.

Tuesday, August 25: Education Day.
Wednesday, August 26: Founders Day.
Thursday, August 27: Industrial Day.
Friday, August 28: Firemen's Day.
Saturday, August 29: Carnival Day.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to introducing a concurrent resolution in Congress to extend felicitations to the residents of Osceola Mills, it was a great privilege to be accorded the honor of acting as grand marshal of the splendid Veterans and Defense Day parade on August 24 and later to deliver the principal address at Memorial Stadium.

Prior to the parade, it was my privilege to be guest of the Rotary Club and to speak during its centennial dinner program.

In cooperation with General Chairman John Redding, Publicity Chairman William B. McFeeters, American Legion Comdr. Stephen Sidorik, and Eugene Danko, commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I was instrumental in arranging with the Department of Defense for the necessary authorization for participation by military units in the program for Veterans and Defense Day. In addition, it was my pleasure to arrange with the Atomic Energy Commission for an eight-panel library unit exhibit titled "The Useful Atom." The display which was made available by the American Museum of Atomic Energy operated by the Institute of Nuclear Studies, Oak Ridge, Tenn., illustrates the story of the atom and some of the peaceful applications in the fields of agriculture, industry, and medicine.

Osceola Mills, despite its population of 2,000, has a fine record for patriotism, a large number of young men from that area having served in World War I, World War II, and the Korean conflict. A total of 37 young men from Osceola Mills offered their lives on the altar of freedom in World War I and World War II.

In one section of the borough park there is a large stone monument, with the inscription "A tribute in commemoration of those who made the Supreme Sacrifice in the Great World War." The two names on the stone are Lt. Harry B. Peters, who was killed in action October 15, 1918, near Romagne, France, and Pvt. James L. Gorman who was killed August 28, 1918, near Fismes, France.

In the other section of the park is another monument in memory of World War II servicemen who died in action. The monument was dedicated jointly by the American Legion and Veterans of Foreign Wars posts and is inscribed as follows:

> This memorial dedicated to perpetuate the memory of our valiant defenders of freedom who made the supreme sacrifice in World War II.

These are the names on the bronze plaque: Jack Arnold, Porter Albright, Chester Beres, Peter Busko, John Domack, Michael Fronslick, William Heath, Vincent Hughes, William Jarrett, Harry Keith, Robert Keller, Leslie Kephart, Jesse Kephart, Clair Kizer, Clark Kizer, Albert McKinney, Cecil McNeish, Francis McNeish, Darrell Merritt, Fred Miller, John Parana, Joseph Petulla, Michael Philiposki, Lewis Price, Robert Redding, Clare Riley, Adam Slabon, Raymond Sokol, Philip Sokolofsky, George Spittler, Harry Stewart, Paul Stevens, William Stevens, Jack Vroman, John Young.

It was fitting that in view of the gallant war history of Osceola Mills that the Department of Defense cooperated to a splendid degree by making a worthwhile contribution to the success of the centennial program.

Opening the celebration on a deep spiritual note with special services in all churches, the centennial program was varied, with each day's program interesting and enjoyable and ending in a carnival-like spirit on August 29 climaxed by a horse show and rodeo at Memorial Field.

The residents of Osceola Mills are to be warmly commended for their enthusiasm and community spirit that always plays an indispensable part in a centennial observance.

The success achieved reflected due credit on the leadership of Chief Burgess John Redding, who acted as president and general chairman of the Osceola Mills Centennial Committee. He was ably assisted by William B. McFeeters, publicity chairman, and by the other officers and members of the various committees who worked as a team of unsung heroes in making certain the success of the centennial program.

In saluting the residents of Osceola Mills on the community's 100th birthday, I am not unmindful of the spendid cooperation extended by members of the clergy, borough council, school officials and teachers, business and industry, veterans' groups, civic, fraternal and service clubs, who with the average citizen pooled their efforts and thus succeeded in making the Osceola Mills centennial an event long to be remembered in the history of central Pennsylvania.

Progress Toward Tax Rate Reform

OF

HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, on January 21, 1959, my friend and distinguished colleague on the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, HOWARD H. BAKER, and I, introduced companion bills, H.R. 3000 and H.R. 3001, to reform Federal tax rates and methods to accord with the economics of progress. We were most gratified when identical bills subsequently were introduced by our esteemed colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, Representative BRUCE ALGER, of Texas (H.R. 3607); and Representative JAMES B. FRAZIER, JR., of Tennessee (H.R. 4266); and also by the distinguished Members of the House, Representative O. C. FISHER, of Texas (H.R. 4584); Representative J. CARLTON LOSER, of Tennessee (H.R. 6776); and Representative C. ROSS ADAIR, of Indiana (H.R. 8765).

In the intervening months, we have received many expressions of encouragement and support from Members of the Congress, from our constituents and other citizens from all sections of the country, from various organizations including many State and local business groups, and from editorial writers and columnists.

The most constant theme of these expressions has been the practical, common sense nature of the legislation. As would be expected, greatest interest has been expressed in the reform in the graduated rates of individual income tax, which now climb so steeply through the middle and higher brackets. Over 5 years, these rates would be compressed downward with reductions of over 50 percent in the middle brackets, and the top rate coming down from 91 to 47 percent to coincide with the new top rate of corporate tax under the legislation. The first bracket rate would be reduced from 20 to 15 percent, giving all individual taxpayers a minimum tax reduction of 25 percent. We are attaching to this statement a table by which tax liability in each bracket can be computed as of the end of the reduction period compared with present law.

The climate favoring tax rate reform over increased Government spending has been strongly evidenced by the enthusiasm for the basic concept of the legislation, namely, priority in use of revenue increase from economic growth—which should run from $4 to $5 billion a year—to moderate the tax obstructions to growth. This enthusiasm has extended to the essential procedure of the legislation, namely, the forward scheduling of rate reductions with postponement in event of budget unbalance.

Great interest has also been displayed in the other features of the legislation—the 1 percentage point annual reduction over the 5-year period in the corporate tax, down to a new top rate of 47 percent; the reduction of approximately 25 percent over the 5-year period in the maximum required property lives for depreciation purposes; the deferral of tax on transfer of capital from one investment to another by individuals; and the uniform reductions in the rates of estate and gift taxes, down to a new top rate of 47 percent on estates and 35.25 on gifts.

The response we have received reenforces our conviction as to the soundness and urgent necessity for enactment of this legislation, and that the overwhelming majority of our citizens would welcome such action by the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in this statement, our purpose is not to repeat the full explanation of the provisions of our bills, and supporting facts, which were included in our introductory statement of January 21, but to state in brief form some of the key points involved in this approach to tax rate reform. In subsequent releases we will elaborate on some of these points.

First, there is the goal of the legislation. It is not primarily to provide tax relief merely for the sake of relief, as important and justifiable as that would be. Instead the fundamental objective is the release of tax brakes on economic progress. More specifically, by permitting the more rapid accumulation of new capital out of current income, and moderating the tax destruction of capital already accumulated, our bills are designed to bring about the achievement of higher economic growth; improvement of old jobs and creation of better jobs; more rapid advance in living standards; starting and development of new businesses; control of inflation through greater production and productivity; strengthening of our economic system and our position of leadership, prestige, and influence in the free world.

From the standpoint of our own citizens, those now in the lower income levels have the most to gain from increase in the flow of capital into the expansion of industry and the resultant improvement of old jobs and creation of better jobs.

Second, despite the benefits which will flow to all citizens from enactment of this legislation, we purposely avoided seeking our goals through the shifting or reshuffling of tax burdens among various segments of our citizens. Our approach reflects only one judgment on the tax law, namely, that rates climb too steeply and are much too high for the good of our economy and the well-being of our citizens.

Third, the goals sought can be attained if the leadership, in the Congress and in the executive branch, makes a very simple decision, namely, that, barring a new military emergency, fundamental reform of tax rates and methods is of much greater importance to the future strength and well-being of our Nation than any and all proposals for increase in spending. In other words, by giving priority to the use of revenue increase from economic growth for the reform of tax rates and methods instead of increased spending, we can achieve a tax rate structure within 5 years which will enable our economy to make much more rapid economic progress than has been the case over recent years. There are three important figures to keep in mind in this respect. A 1-percent increase in gross national product, the commonly accepted measure of economic growth, will produce a revenue increase of approximately a billion dollars a year. For 60 years before the depression of the 1930's, our economic growth averaged out at approximately 4 percent a year, which if achieved hereafter would mean revenue increase of approximately $4 billion a year. The revenue effect of our bills would average about $3.5 billion a year. Thus, if upon enactment of our bills the growth rate should no more than equal the historic average, there still would be a surplus available for debt retirement of approximately one-half a billion dollars a year. Actually, there is no reason why upon enactment of this legislation our economy should not begin to move upward toward a steady growth rate in the order of 5 percent instead of 4 percent. Such a rate of growth is clearly possible because of the speed of technological advance and the fact that a higher income economy can save more than a lower income economy—if not restrained by punitive tax rates.

Fourth, the procedure of our bills, forward scheduling of rate reduction linked with postponement in the event of budget imbalance would enable the Nation's leadership to make the necessary decision without fear of a return to a period of deficit financing. This point cannot be stressed too strongly. In the current session of Congress, we have witnessed and supported the determined effort exerted by the leadership of both national parties in the Congress and the administration, to reduce and control the spending level. Enactment of the pending legislation would add both strength and greater meaning to this effort, since it would offer on a continuing basis over its life a clear choice for the public between greater spending or a more moderate tax rate structure.

Fifth, over the years ahead enactment of fundamental tax rate reform legislation will not prejudice debt retirement. To the contrary tax rate reform inevitably will pave the way to greater and more consistent reduction in the Federal debt. We are completely sympathetic to the laudable aims of debt retirement, but we want to keep the horse before the cart. The public debt is now in the order of $285 billion and, even if $3.5 billion a year were applied to its reduction over the next 5 years, it would still be in excess of $265 billion—leaving the major job still ahead of us. By contrast, the application of the same amount of revenue dollars to fundamental tax rate reform over this period would mean that a greater part of the tax reform job would be behind us. This not only would mean that the annual revenue gain would be greater and more consistent thereafter, for whatever division between debt retirement and further tax reforms that might be decided—it also would mean greater revenue gain and hence some opportunity for debt retirement during the 5-year period itself. In short, the debt retirement job is, of necessity, a long-range one, whereas the tax rate reform task can be substantially accomplished over a relatively few years. Its accomplishment, therefore, is the first step toward insuring maximum and consistent reduction in the debt over the long run.

Sixth, our bills would contribute to broadening of the Federal tax base, an aim which is of great concern to all Federal tax policymakers and authorities in this era of high public spending. The great interest in this area is the base of the individual income tax, which tax provides roughly 50 percent of Federal revenues. In 1957, the base of this tax, defined as "taxable income," was approximately 43 percent of total personal income, as compared with 34 percent only 10 years earlier. The reason for this growth in the tax base is that without material change in exemptions, credits and deductions, taxable income increases roughly 50 percent faster than the increase in personal income. Thus, achievement of higher rates of growth and of increase in personal income, which would be brought about by enactment of the pending legislation, would accelerate expansion of the tax base.

Seventh, in permitting an increase in the rate of new savings, and by moderating the destruction of capital already saved, our bills would strike at the roots of the inflation problem, and also at the interest rate problem as it has been highlighted in the contemporary controversy over lifting the ceiling on interest rates of Federal bonds. The inflation of this era essentially reflects a greater demand from all sources for the combined product of economic activity than can be provided by capital formation under present tax rates. The constant upward pressure on interest rates is simply a reflection of the inadequacy of new savings to do all of the things which all of our citizens want done to enhance their economic well being. Stated differently, a greater rate of new savings is the only route to greater rates of increase in production and productivity, which in turn are the means to better satisfaction of competing demands on the economy while dampening inflationary pressures.

Eighth, there is the matter of job creation and betterment. We are moving into a period in which there will be a significant step-up in the numbers of new workers coming each year into our labor force, reflecting the very rapid increase in population trends starting from World War II. The question is not just one of providing jobs, since people can always be put at doing things which essentially result in sharing the work and hence reducing average living standards, instead of steadily increasing those standards. Better jobs, more good opportunities for old as well as new workers, can come about only by the availability of more capital which is the only means for translating into effective use the benefits of technological progress. Related to this subject alone, the pending legislation might well be called the Job Betterment Act of 1960.

Ninth, we come to a matter which ranks high in the interest and concern of every Member of Congress, namely, the starting and development of new businesses. There can be no doubt as to the forces which hold back the full flowering of the American genius for striking out on one's own and for improvement and expansion of an enterprise once begun—the shortage of capital, essentially of the venture variety, and stifled incentives, both resulting from our present tax rate structure. All the reforms provided in our bills would contribute toward the release of tax obstructions to business development from the starting stage onward, but the most important reform in this respect would be the compression of the individual tax rate scale under the umbrella of a reasonable top rate. Here is the key not only to a substantial increase in the accumulation of new venture capital, but also to making it much more worthwhile from the incentive standpoint both to use capital so accumulated and to transfer other capital into new and more venturesome enterprises. The individual income tax is the special cross of small business. On the one hand, it chokes off the traditional source of venture capital for the starting and development of new businesses, whether or not such businesses are conducted in the incorporated or unincorporated form. On the other hand, some 85 percent of business units in the country are unincorporated, and hence are the particular prey of the ruthless graduation of the personal income tax rates.

Tenth, there are the self-employed professional people, whose incomes also are subject to the ruthless graduation of the individual income tax. The only fundamental solution of the tax problem of these key members of our society is substantial compression of the individual tax rate structure as provided in our bills.

Eleventh, in a time when the American free economic system is held out as a showcase for the free world, our Federal tax system is an exceedingly poor model for export. For many years, we have endured gross contradiction of policies in this respect. On the one hand, we have sent untold billions of dollars of taxpayers money abroad—and encouraged private investment abroad—to aid and spark the development of the economies and to raise the living standards of free world nations. On the other hand, we have continued a tax model at home which both inhibits the formation of new capital and destroys capital once accumulated; a model, which when copied or continued abroad simply tends to perpetuate the need for foreign funds to build up economies, especially in the so-called less-developed countries. Who could doubt that enactment of tax rate reform legislation in this country based on the concept of moderate rates at all points would set a pattern for similar action in other countries, thus significantly reducing the need for foreign aid funds over the years.

Twelfth, there are the challenging twin problems of the Russian bid for world economic leadership and the growing success of Western European and other countries in competing with us everywhere including our own domestic markets. Certainly, if we are to lead effectively, and to compete successfully, in a period of dynamic economic growth throughout the world, we need to rid ourselves as rapidly as possible of the tax shackles which are binding our free economy.

Thirteenth, the key provision of the legislation, the compression over 5 years of the steep climb of the graduated income tax rates down to moderate and reasonable levels considered alone does not present a significant revenue problem. This is so because the graduated part of the rate structure provides only 14 percent of the revenue derived from the individual income tax or about $5 billion a year.

And, finally, the test of fairness of a reformed income tax rate structure must be found in the relative burden of taxes after enactment and not in the relative percentage cuts applied to preexisting rates. In this connection, it is often overlooked that the measure of regressivity, proportionality or progressivity of a tax is the relation of tax to total income, not to the base of the tax, that is, taxable income as regards the individual tax. This relationship is known as the effective rate of tax. The point is that exemptions provide substantial protection from payment of tax to people in the lower income brackets, protection which diminishes rapidly as income increases. Under our bills there would be a range of effective tax rates from only 1 or 2 percent in lower levels of income subject to tax, up toward 47 percent at the top. Certainly such a range of progression would satisfy all but the most extreme advocates of this form of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, it is our hope that this statement will contribute to a more general realization that the fundamental reform of tax rates and methods as provided in our bills is practical and feasible, as well as urgently needed in the national interest; that there will develop before the Congress convenes again in January an insistent demand that there be no further delay in congressional action; and that the Nation's leaders, in the Congress and in the executive branch will give the subject the priority it deserves.

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, one of the highlights of the 60th National Convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States now in session at Los Angeles was an address delivered by RICHARD M. NIXON, Vice President of the United States.

Introduced by Commander in Chief John Mahan, Vice President NIXON spoke to a capacity audience that included a cross section of America's overseas fighting men and their wives, together with leaders in the business and military life of the Nation.

The address follows:

EXCERPTS OF REMARKS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE 60TH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES, LOS ANGELES, CALIF., AUGUST 31, 1959

This is the fourth time in 6 years that I have had the honor of addressing the national convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

In looking over the speeches I have made in previous years, I find that I have in each one spoken of the threat of international communism to peace and the security of the United States. I chose that subject on previous occasions because I believed that was the greatest issue before the United States and the world.

Today I shall speak to you on the same subject because, despite the developments in recent weeks which have resulted in the announcement of an exchange of visits between President Eisenhower and Mr. Khrushchev, the magnitude and seriousness of the challenge presented to the free world by the leaders of the Communist world is just as great as it was before these visits were announced.

I particularly want to direct my remarks today to those who have expressed concern over the wisdom of inviting Mr. Khrushchev to the United States. The motives which cause this concern are laudable ones. They are motives that all of us in this room share—patriotism, love of country, opposition to Communism and a well-justified suspicion of Communist tactics. I understand and respect the right of distinguished Americans like your speaker at tonight's dinner, Mr. George Meany, to express doubts as to the President's decision on this invitation.

And, while I disagree with Mr. Meany on some issues, may I say to you what I have said on previous occasions, that there is no more vigorous, articulate and effective opponent of communism in the United States than he is. The American trade union movement which he heads deserves the thanks of all the American people for the effective work it has done throughout the world in helping free trade unions to resist Communist infiltration and domination. I can testify from firsthand experience that in many of the countries that I have visited in Asia, Africa and South America I found that one of the strongest bulwarks against communism was a strong, free trade union movement.

Recognizing that there are plus and minus factors involved, I would like to state for you today the case for Mr. Khrushchev's visit to the United States. First, let's look at some hard facts.

The United States and the U.S.S.R. are the two strongest nations on the face of the earth, each possessing almost unbelievable destructive power. The fact that one intercontinental ballistic missile can travel the 5,000 miles between the United States and the U.S.S.R. in less than thirty minutes, carrying a warhead which has more destructive power than all the bombs dropped by both sides in World War II, is just one small indication of that strength.

There are differences between the United States and the U.S.S.R.—basic, deep differences of which the Berlin crisis is only one of many. If we fail to settle those differences at the conference table, the only other way to settle them is by a war which would destroy civilization as we know it. If our differences are to be settled at the conference table, we must talk with our opponents.

In the case of the Communist dictatorship of the U.S.S.R., only one man—Mr. Khrushchev—is the man to talk to. He has absolutely unlimited power to make decisions on these great issues. We can continue to talk to him by firing messages across the 5,000 miles which separate us and we may end up firing missiles at each other. I believe that if we are to talk it is better to do so across the table face to face so that the chance for misunderstanding will be reduced to a minimum.

But why bring him here, some may ask? Why not go someplace else to talk to him? Because this man who has greater uncontrolled power in his hands than any man in the history of the world, the power by his decision alone to set off a chain reaction which could start a world war, has some very dangerous delusions and misconceptions about the United States and its people.

He knows that we are militarily strong and that we are economically rich. But because he believes so fanatically in the Communist philosophy, despite everything he has heard to the contrary, he has convinced himself that the United States is a country seething with discontent, that millions of Americans live in poverty oppressed by the wealthy few, that a substantial number of our people do not support the President in his firm stand against Communist aggression. In a nutshell, consequently, these misconceptions lead him to conclude America has the strength but may lack the will to defend her vital interests.

I have seen and talked to Mr. Khrushchev. I am convinced that if he continues to believe what he presently believes about us we can only expect him to continue on his present course of reckless unilateral action like his precipitation of the Berlin crisis. And the risk we would be taking would be a war no one wants which would destroy civilization itself.

I am not suggesting that we should be so naive as to think that his visit to the United States will change his ideas about the relative merits of communism and our system of government.

But he will find that the overwhelming majority of the American people believe in their system just as deeply as he believes in his. That regardless of party we are united behind the President in our determination to defend our independence and that of other free nations with whom we are allied in the event of aggression. And that while the American people want peace, he should never mistake our dedication to peace for weakness, fear, or lack of determination to defend ourselves where our vital interests are attacked.

The peace we want is not the peace of surrender or appeasement but peace with justice. If Mr. Khrushchev has this lesson brought home to him by what he sees and hears in the United States, this visit will have been justified apart from the results of any conversations he may have with the President, because it will have reduced the possibility that he may miscalculate by underestimating our will to resist and thereby precipitate a crisis which could only result in war.

Now put yourself in the place of the President of the United States. It would be tempting for him to view this evil philosophy with scorn and detachment, to refuse to talk to and to meet its representatives except through the usual formal diplomatic channels. But I say that it would be the height of irresponsibility on the part of the President of the United States to take this posture, popular as it might be at the moment, and allow the world to continue to drift into two hostile camps and an inevitable, suicidal war.

In judging the merits of this visit, let me list some of the things that will not result from it.

There will be no acquiescence or approval by us of the status of the captive nations of eastern Europe. There will not be any change in the opposition of the government and people of the United States to communism at home or abroad. There will not be any reduction of U.S. military strength in the absence of self-enforcing disarmament agreements which we know will be kept by them as well as by us. There will be no negotiating on issues affecting our allies without their being present. And there will be no abandonment of our position that the 2,500,000 people of West Berlin must continue to be guaranteed the right to retain the free government which they have chosen by overwhelming vote.

In addition to providing Mr. Khrushchev a chance to see the United States and to know the truth about not only our military and economic strength but also the will and determination of the American people, it will provide an opportunity for him to discuss issues directly with President Eisenhower which affect the peace of the world.

Now I realize that there are those who object to such talks on the ground that they fear they may result in appeasement, surrender of some of our basic interests; some even suggest that Mr. Khrushchev may outwit, outsmart or trap the President and his associates.

To answer these charges bluntly, I think it is time for us to recognize that the Communists are not so smart and we are not so dumb as this kind of talk would imply.

The difficulty in the past has not been so much with what was agreed at the conference table but the fact that the Communists broke the agreements. This has occurred in the case of 50 out of 52 major treaties and agreements since 1933. But we can be sure this time that the President will have in mind the last Geneva Conference where Mr. Khrushchev failed to carry out the agreements on unification of Germany and other issues which they reached at that time.

The President is well aware of the fact that Communist subversion in the United States is still being financed and supported by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

And if there were ever any doubts that the President would not enter these talks with his guard up, the news from Laos has certainly laid them to rest. The support and the encouragement which the governments of the U.S.S.R. and Communist China have been giving to the rebels in that country have served to alert the whole free world to the fact that communism's drive for world domination continues without letup.

In other words, those who believe that this conference is going to result in appeasement, surrender, defensiveness and softness toward communism simply do not know the President of the United States.

We have learned a lot in our dealings with the Communists over the past few years. While we will always treat a guest in our country with courtesy, we know that charm, flattery, and gracious toasts have no effect whatever in changing the rigid positions of the Communists leaders. We have learned that in our meetings with them we have to be just as hard-headed, tough-minded and realistic as they are. This is an approach Mr. Khrushchev respects and understands and this is the kind of a man he will face in President Eisenhower.

There are some who say it was undignified for me to reply to Mr. Khrushchev in public when he attacked the United States and our policies when I was escorting him through the U.S. exhibition in Moscow.

My answer is that I, too, would prefer that important issues be discussed in a dignified private conference. But what we have to recognize is that we are engaged in a great battle of ideas with the Communist world. Mr. Khrushchev knows this well. He never misses an opportunity to make propaganda for the Communist way of life. And I say that it is time for us in the free world to quit being defensive, apologetic, and mealy-mouthed when our system comes under attack, publicly or privately.

We in the free world must stand up and fight for our ideas just as the Communists do for theirs. We have allowed too much to go unchallenged, the kind of talk that says the free nations are decadent, divided and weak. The only and best way to progress in the newly-developing countries is through communism. Communism rather than freedom is the wave of the future. The Communist leaders are too crafty and shrewd for us at the conference table. Their education system is superior to ours.

We have been on the defensive long enough. It is time for us to take the offensive and help make the whole world realize that the Communist idea is not a super idea; that the Communist leaders are not supermen; and that the Soviet Union is not a supernation.

We should not underestimate the deadly seriousness of the challenge which is presented to us because of the disciplined dedication of the Communist leaders. But let us not make the mistake of meeting that challenge with a negative, defeatist, static posture.

As the international spotlight shifts from long-distance threats to man-to-man conferences, we should be cautious. But caution is not the same as a paralyzing suspicion that prevents any move toward peace. Let us give the President our united and wholehearted support as he takes the leadership in the cause of peace with justice.

When Mr. Khrushchev challenges us to peaceful competition, let us go him one better and urge expansion of that competition to include the spiritual as well as the material aspects of our society. Let there be competition between ideas not only in the free world but in the Communist world as well.

We should welcome and encourage a greater exchange of persons and ideas between the free world and the Communist world. A free society thrives on free discussion, criticism, and interplay of ideas. On the other hand, dictators use fear, suspicion, and secrecy to maintain their power and control over the people.

When Mr. Khrushchev says that our grandchildren will live under communism, our answer should be—we do not fear the outcome provided they have the freedom to choose the system they want. We do not say in reply that his grandchildren will live under capitalism. The very essence of our belief is that we will not impose it on anyone else, and that every people should have a right to choose the kind of economic and political system which best fits its particular problems.

But this we do believe—that all the people on this earth, including those of the Soviet Union—will inevitably demand and obtain more and more freedom. Because history teaches us that man was made to be free and that freedom, not communism or any other form of dictatorship, is the wave of the future.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars can render invaluable service to the cause of peace and freedom to which we are all dedicated.

Let our answer to the aggressive tactics of world communism not be simply defensive, negative, and fearful. The best answer to the Communist revolution is the kind of life produced by the American Revolution. The most effective antidote to communism is a program of intelligent, articulate, positive Americanism.

AFL–CIO Interview with Hon. Alexander Wiley, of Wisconsin, on Khrushchev Visit to United States

OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we recognize that the upcoming visit of Premier Khrushchev is creating a wide variety of reactions among our citizens throughout the country.

These include strong views both for and against the visit. The predominant feeling, however, appears to be that—now that the invitation has been extended and accepted—the American people should back up the President and create the climate that will enable the best results to be obtained from the exchange visits between President Eisenhower and Premier Khrushchev.

Recently, I was privileged to discuss various aspects of the Khrushchev visit on the AFL–CIO broadcast "Washington Reports to the People." I ask unanimous consent to have the interview printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS OF REMARKS PREPARED FOR DELIVERY BY SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY, REPUBLICAN OF WISCONSIN, RADIO AND NEWSPAPER NETWORKS OF THE AFL–CIO

Question. Senator WILEY, do you feel the invitation to Mr. Khrushchev to visit this country is a good idea?

Senator WILEY. Overall, I feel the upcoming visit has possibilities for positive accomplishments; at the same time, there are dangers. On the positive side, the visit can (1) correct a few of Mr. Khrushchev's misconceptions about this country; (2) confirm our peaceful intentions; (3) emphasize the unity of the country behind its leadership; (4) give the Soviet leader a real knowledge of the high standard of living of Mr. and Mrs. Average America; and (5) again emphasize that, although our policies are peaceful, we will not be pushed around.

Globally, I would hope that the Khrushchev visit would not be interpreted as a sign that we are "going soft" on communism.

President Eisenhower—the standard bearer of our policy—has made a decision that, in his judgment, will best serve the interests of our security and world peace. The American people—in a united, bipartisan manner—I believe should now give full support to that decision.

Question. Do you have any real fears of Mr. Khrushchev's personal safety while he is in this country?

Senator WILEY. Naturally, I believe that all necessary security precautions should be taken. There are a great many people—particularly from Poland, Hungary, and other captive nations—who deeply resent, and understandably so, the Premier's being invited to this country.

For the public—and our allies—it should be made abundantly clear that the invitation does not demonstrate approval of communism, or of Communist tactics, that have resulted in international tensions and dangers to peace.

As a whole, however, I am confident that the Nation will act in a mature and responsible manner.

Question. Senator WILEY, do you feel that the American people might expect too much from such a visit?

Senator WILEY. No. The years of the cold war, I believe, have conditioned our people to the Soviets' hard policies. As a result, we don't expect any magical, overnight change in Soviet programs.

Question. Do you think the exchange of visits might lead to a summit meeting later on?

Senator WILEY. The decision for a summit meeting—as I have stressed before— rests squarely on President Eisenhower. As the President has stated, such a decision would—and should—be based upon whether it would make a constructive contribution toward easing tensions and resolving East-West differences.

The Eisenhower-Khrushchev exchange visits may or may not make a contribution toward justifying a summit conference.

Question. Do you think that the Khrushchev trip might succeed in altering some of his misconceptions of conditions in the United States?

Senator WILEY. Yes. As a matter of fact, I believe it would be worthwhile—to the degree possible—to plan his trips and contacts to achieve this objective.

As I understand it, however, the planning of the trip is a matter to be agreed upon between the State Department and the Russian Embassy—which, of course, gets its directions from Moscow.

Question. Senator, even if his mistaken ideas are corrected, do you think there is any real likelihood of altering his ultimate aims of world domination by communism?

Senator WILEY. Frankly, I doubt that we can expect to see any far-reaching changes in Communist policy in the near future. To the contrary, the Soviet leaders continue to reiterate their prediction—erroneous, I am confident—that socialism—in the Soviet Union, a false front for totalitarian communism—will eventually rule the world.

Policywise, the communist strategy is changing from "aims of military conquest" to efforts at economic, political and ideological penetration of the Western World. However, there has not as yet—nor can we expect it in the near future—any swaying from the ultimate goal of world domination. Consequently, we must gear our policies and programs to a long-range struggle against communism.

Overall, however, I believe the Khrushchev visit may further "break the ice" for top level—and possibly more fruitful lower level—exchanges to attempt to iron out East-West differences.

In the light of these factors, real "proof" of willingness to effectively promote peace still demands of Khrushchev not words of peace, but deeds.

Books and the Cold War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my statement entitled "Books and the Cold War," together with a letter from Mr. Harry Agency, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MCCARTHY

I should like to recall for the RECORD the discussion about books and Soviet censorship which took place on the floor of the Senate near the end of last month.

At that time we were enlightened by spokesmen of both the conservative and liberal wings of the Republican Party who stood together in advising us that the administration had in response to the Soviet Union's demand removed certain books from the American exhibition at the Moscow Fair.

Of course, the administration was really not blamed. The role of other villains was stressed.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], representing the conservative wing of the Grand Old Party, entitled his remarks: "Wanted: A Liberal Crusade," and his open attack was on liberals in the Senate and throughout the Nation who were not riding to battle against the Soviet censors as he thought they should. He asked:

"Now the Soviet Union is openly and bluntly censoring the books in our American exhibit in Moscow. Do we hear the liberal bugles sounding the call to battle: Is the air filled with expressions of indignation and invective?" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 29, 1959, p. 14591).

With that provocation the senior Senator from Minnesota and the junior Senator did reply in order to establish, successfully I think, that in reality the removal of books was an administration decision, and if it represented a retreat, that it was an administration retreat.

Also in the course of that debate, I took the position that the primary responsibility of liberals is the defense of civil liberties and the protection of free access to information here in the United States. We are unable to control what is done everywhere in the world. Our first obligation is to set an example at home. Although we can protest censorship abroad and should give support to those who oppose it, it is not our basic responsibility.

I also had some reservations about the administration's responsibility. If the administration officials were guilty of cowardice, then, of course, that action should be protested. But it seemed to me that the critics should have heard the administration's side, so I wrote to the U.S. Information Service for the information on the contract under which the displays were agreed upon. A fair for the mutual exchange of exhibitions of "Science, Technology, and Culture" is not primarily the place for political debate. We are under no obligation to have cultural and scientific exchanges, but if we agree to attend them usually there are conditions attached.

I have received a reply to my letter from Mr. Harry Tyson Carter, General Counsel for USIA, and from his account of the terms of the agreement between the administration and the U.S.S.R., it seems to me that our friends on the other side started clamoring too soon for a liberal crusade. Mr. Carter writes that while there was no specific agreement on the books to be exhibited, "the agreement did specify with respect to souvenir buttons, emblems, mementos, and samples to be distributed (par. 5) and with respect to motion pictures and slides to be shown (par. 13) that each party would be given an opportunity to make, each to the other, recommendations with respect to the items to be distributed or to be shown.

"It was within the spirit of these provisions that Mr. McClellan received the objections of Soviet officials to the display of certain books. The United States has not accepted these objections as prohibitions, but merely as recommendations, reserving the final decision as to whether specific books will, or will not, be displayed.

"In this connection it should be pointed out that more than 8,000 books arrived in Moscow for the book exhibit. Some were immediately considered by Mr. McClellan to be inappropriate to the purposes of the exhibition."

I attach herewith a letter Mr. Carter wrote. The point is clear, I think.

I should now like to quote a few lines from the actual agreement between our Government and the Soviet Union. In the preamble it is stated that:

"As a mutual declaration of the spirit and intention which shall govern the interpretation and execution of the terms and conditions of this agreement, mention is made of the fact that the success of this exchange of exhibitions requires a substantial degree of flexibility and discretion for each party hereto to determine the scope, nature, and content of its exhibition. * * * There is also, on this account, required and proffered, each to the other, a high degree of trust and cooperation to the end that each exhibition will be facilitated and made successful in furtherance of the mutually advantageous purposes of the above mentioned exchange agreements."

Section 13 of the agreement contains this sentence:

"Each party may show at its exhibition site such motion pictures or slides as it deems appropriate which would be cultural and nonpolitical in character, devoted to an objective presentation of various aspects of its science, technology, or culture."

These excerpts make clear, I believe, that the exhibition was to be nonpolitical in character and that there was an implicit obligation for each government to act in conformity with these general terms. Mr. McClellan, general manager of American exhibit, had the duty to exercise his judgment as to whether books selected fitted in with the spirit of the exhibition agreement. Mr. Carter also notes that as of August 7, with the exception of five books which Mr. McClellan had under study, "all books ever placed on the shelves at the exhibition (including those temporarily withheld during the process of final selection) have now been placed on public display."

I do not always find myself able to uphold the administration, but in this case I am happy to do so. I think the report indicates that Mr. McClellan exercised good judgment and acted in a manner consistent with American tradition and good manners. I trust that Mr. Carter's letter will show that this small tempest in a bookcase did not have the makings of a hurricane. The attack of Republicans in Congress should not have been directed at liberals or at the administration.

On the other hand, I believe this incident does highlight the important fact of the great value of books in the cold war. The use of the power of books to convey ideas and reflect and preserve the richness of American intellectual life and political thought is as important as our economic and military tactics.

Mr. Khrushchev has boasted that the Soviet Union will outproduce us. They may. It may well be that the Soviet Union is ahead of us in satellites. It may catch up with us in washing machines and color television. But the Soviet Union can never, without changing its system, catch up with us in the realm of ideas and the free expression of them. In this contest, our greatest strength is our intellectual creativity, including political thought, and books are the principal means of exporting our ideas. The one area in which the Soviet Union cannot compete and cannot even afford to try to compete is in the area of ideas. Books and the free discussion of the ideas they contain are decisive points of distinction and contrast between the democratic and the totalitarian way of life.

So while I do not think we can expect to use an official exhibition at the Moscow fair as the place of distributing books with liberal ideas, we can and should greatly expand our efforts to make books available to people all over the world.

To this end, I am pleased to see that Ambassador Lodge recently signed the Florence agreement for the United States. This agreement, which provides for the reciprocal elimination of trade barriers on the importation of educational, scientific and cultural materials, was approved by the General Conference of UNESCO in Florence, Italy. It has already been ratified by 31 countries. Contracting states to the agreement grant duty-free entry, under prescribed conditions, to a wide range of materials, including books, publications, and documents. The agreement has been in effect since 1952 and we should have been among the first to ratify it. It will greatly facilitate the exportation of books and other scientific and cultural materials from the United States to other countries. It will be also benefit our own citizens, since they will be relieved of the 5-percent ad valorem U.S. tariff on current books in the English language and the 7½-percent tariff on printed music.

The Florence agreement was received by the Senate last week on August 25 and has already been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. As one of the Senators appointed by the Secretary of State to the U.S. National Commission for UNESO, I urge its approval. Against the background of the importance of books in the cold war, the ratification of the Florence agreement will be a significant step.

U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY,
Washington, August 13, 1959.

The Honorable EUGENE J. MCCARTHY,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARTHY: This is in reply to your letter of August 5, 1959, concerning the book exhibit at the American national exhibition in Moscow.

As regard your specific inquiries, there was no agreement in advance concerning the books to be exhibited. The exchange of exhibitions with the Soviet Union grew out of the basic agreement on cultural, technical, and educational exchanges signed in Washington on January 27, 1958. A protocol agreement of September 10, 1958, called for an exchange of exhibits in the summer of 1959 devoted to the demonstration of the development of science, technology, and culture. This protocol agreement was implemented by a more detailed agreement between the United States and the All-Union Chamber of Commerce of the U.S.S.R. executed on December 29, 1958. A copy of this agreement, which is the basic document relating to this exhibition, is enclosed.

As you will observe, there is no reference whatsoever to books in this agreement. The basic understanding as to the content of the reciprocal exhibitions (always within the framework of "science, technology, and culture") is expressed only in the preamble to the agreement.

However, the agreement did specify with respect to souvenir buttons, emblems, mementos, and samples to be distributed (par. 5) and with respect to motion pictures and slides to be shown (par. 13) that each party would be given an opportunity to make, each to the other, recommendations with respect to the items to be distributed or to be shown.

It was within the spirit of these provisions that Mr. McClellan received the objections of Soviet officials to the display of certain books. The United States has not accepted these objections as prohibitions, but merely as recommendations, reserving the final decision as to whether specific books will, or will not, be displayed.

In this connection it should be pointed out that more than 8,000 books arrived in Moscow for the book exhibit. Some were immediately considered by Mr. McClellan to be inappropriate to the purposes of the exhibition. Certain others were sent to the exhibition site and placed on the shelves for the purpose of selection and arrangement, but were withdrawn prior to public display. It was principally these books which were involved in the controversies reported in the press. Mr. McClellan could not personally check these books overnight and thus postponed judgment on some selections until after the exhibition officially opened to permit adequate study.

Subsequent to the opening of the exhibition, Soviet officials requested that five books be withdrawn. Mr. McClellan removed these five from the shelves for review in order to consider the Soviet recommendation.

As of August 7 Mr. McClellan reported that, with the exception of the five books referred to above, all books ever placed on the shelves at the exhibition (including those temporarily withheld during the process of final selection) have now been placed on public display.

The titles of the five books under review are as follows: Wallbank's "Man's Story"; Miller's "Archeology in the Soviet Union"; "World Topics Year Book of 1959"; "Britannica Book of the Year 1959"; "85th Congress, 1st Session, Soviet Economic Growth: A Comparison with the United States."

The criteria which Mr. McClellan will apply in deciding whether or not to return any or all of the five books to the shelves is simply a commonsense judgment as to whether or not display of the books is in furtherance of the intent and objectives of the agreement for a reciprocal exchange of exhibitions.

In closing I might note that reports from Moscow consistently rate our book exhibit as one of the most effective of the entire exhibition. No doubt you have noticed this in the press.

If we can be of further assistance, please let me know.

Sincerely,

HARRY TYSON CARTER,
General Counsel and Congressional Liaison.

HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in saluting the diamond jubilee anniversary of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. This makes 60 years of patriotic service by one of the finest veterans' organizations of our time. They are a proud organization, proud of their beginning and proud of their continued zeal in the welfare of the Nation, the State, and the community. Their type of achievements and leadership makes me truly proud and honored that I have been a member of this great organization for over 40 years.

Since 1899, the national membership has grown to 1,200,000. In the Empire State of New York alone the membership now totals 67,842.

The members of the VFW, who cherish wearing the Cross of Malta, the emblem of the VFW, are veterans of an organization unique in its eligibility requirements. To join its ranks, a man must be able to produce an honorable discharge from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force, or Coast Guard, showing "service honest and faithful" in time of war in a theater of operation.

It matters not whether that service was on the frozen plains of the Arctic, in the battles of Chateau-Thierry, or St. Lo, in the steaming jungles of the Philippines, Guadalcanal, or Burma; at Iwo Jima or the Chosin Reservoir, Bunker Hill, the Inchon landing, the liberation of Seoul; or in the mountains of Korea—the members of the VFW walk with their heads high.

From the beginning, under the leadership of Gen. Irving Hale, to the present commander in chief, John W. Mahan, the VFW has pledged to defend the principles of human rights in times of peace and war.

The greatest legislative assembly in the world, the Congress of the United States, granted the VFW a charter. In this charter the purpose of the organization is clearly defined. To preserve and strengthen comradeship among its members; to assist worthy comrades; to perpetuate the memory of our dead and to assist their widows and orphans; to maintain true allegiance to the Government of the United States of America and fidelity to its Constitution and laws; to foster true patriotism; to maintain and extend the institutions of American freedom; and to preserve and defend the United States from all her enemies whomsoever.

The VFW, with its rich heritage, has always been in the forefront to provide aid and assistance to its members and families. The record of legislation with its analysis, submitted monthly by our able director of national legislative service, Omar B. Ketchum and his staff, keep the VFW members well informed as to action on bills in Congress.

Throughout the Nation, in large and small communities, the VFW has sponsored and successfully carried out various projects beneficial to civic welfare, schools and churches, and to our youth. One outstanding project, and one which is very successful, is the national home at Eaton Rapids, Mich. This is the refuge for children whose fathers were totally disabled or are deceased. It is a splendid example of what any group of determined and public-spirited citizens can do.

As members of the VFW, we assume without reservation our responsibilities to maintain, strengthen, and defend the institutions of American liberty.

As the name implies, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States is an organization of men who have fought behind Old Glory in many foreign lands. These are the men who crushed foreign tyrants; these are the men who have proved their patriotism by offering their bodies and souls so that liberty should not perish from the earth, and American ideals and institutions might be preserved for posterity.

Prayers, Not Cheers, for Nikita Khrushchev

OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, one of New Hampshire's most outstanding weekly newspapers, the Hampton Union, which has stanchly opposed inviting Khrushchev to visit this country, last week endorsed the proposal of Americans for Constitutional Action that the forthcoming visit be offset by prayer.

In his fine editorial, Publisher Edward Seavey urges that prayers be raised instead of cheers when the Soviet Premier arrives. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that this excellent editorial be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRAYERS, NOT CHEERS

Nikita Khrushchev's 12-day itinerary in the United States appears already to have been worked out in considerable detail—with official Washington taking the brunt of it and the only other cities to be infected being New York, Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. The Soviets themselves have turned down more elaborate and extensive inspection of the Nation for the fairly obvious reason that they do not wish to be obligated to show President Eisenhower very much of the "people's paradise."

Included among the turndowns, we assume, is the ill-advised invitation by the president of the New Hampshire Weekly Publishers Association for the "Butcher of Budapest" to attend the fall meeting of the New England Weekly Publishers to be held at the Crawford House for which the Granite State editors are serving as hosts.

This newspaper's position on the Khrushchev visit is too well known to bother with disassociating ourselves with any such invitation and misguided concept of the value of a free exchange of ideas.

To speak of freedom and Khrushchev in the same breath is the height of foolishness. The Soviet leader is the living symbol of communism—an ideology that recognizes no personal dignity or freedom and which is dedicated to destroy everything America stands for. And no visit to our free land is going to alter that course one iota.

Senator STYLES BRIDGES ably summed up our feelings on the matter in a statement this week from Washington:

"My position in regard to the visit of Khrushchev to this country is well known. I am opposed to it, and I have been opposed to it. The invitation, however, has been extended and accepted, so we must view the visit in the light of this situation. The courtesy of proper protocol must be observed and the bad manners heckling which Vice President NIXON underwent must not be repeated here.

"On the other hand, we should not let the traditional optimism of a free people, living a life of abundance, become the inadvertent launching pad for a Soviet propaganda missile aimed at our destruction.

"All people of the free world must realize that in inviting Khrushchev here, and in a proposed return visit to Russia on the part of President Eisenhower, a calculated but nonetheless grave risk is being taken. We must not again fall into the error of personal diplomacy, which led us into the tragedies of Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam. Let any agreements that may be reached in these visits be a matter of public record immediately.

"From the recent Nixon talks with Khrushchev, it is apparent that Russia suffers from a vast inferiority complex and that Khrushchev is the personification of that national feeling. The rationalization of an inferiority complex is a subconscious tendency to overestimate one's ability. Khrushchev's visit to this country can be of value in demonstrating to him our military and economic strength, on the one hand, and on the other, the solidarity of purpose of the American people. Such an education, while it might not halt his tirades against this country, would at least establish the fact that he spoke in terms of falsehood rather than plain ignorance.

"A return visit by President Eisenhower would again demonstrate to the Russian people, as did Vice President NIXON'S visit, that we are interested in solving world problems on a peaceable basis and not as the warmongers their Kremlin masters picture us.

"The dangers, on the other hand, are many. Already there are those who would relax somewhat in our all-out effort on the basis of the fact that visits have been tentatively scheduled. This is utter folly since no one can foresee the attitudes and issues which may develop. The exchange will be fraught with propaganda pitfalls which the Russian leaders are only too willing to distort to their own advantage.

"The American people must view the exchange of visits as an experiment or a new approach in dealing with the Soviet Union. The invitation to Khrushchev, for which he has angled for some time, should not be hailed as a positive accomplishment in the area of our relations with the Soviet Union. It would be tragic indeed if the lessons of sputnik melted away in the thaw of a Khrushchev smile."

While there are those who hope that a mighty public protest against the visit may still cause its indefinite postponement, most Americans have resigned themselves to the eventuality and all sorts of suggestions have been forthcoming as to how we should receive the Russian demagog.

The best to date, we believe, is the thinking and planning of Adm. Ben Moreell, USN (retired), who, as chairman of Americans for Constitutional Action, is urging that the blight of the Khrushchev visit be offset by prayer.

In a letter to churchmen, Admiral Moreell reported that they had invited members of 19 patriotic organizations representing 10 million Americans to discuss with them an appropriate posture regarding the Khrushchev visit.

"There was general agreement," he wrote, "that since we are a people whose trust is in God * * * the moral implications of the visit far outweigh all the others.

"The question arises then whether, by inviting this visitor to our shores, we give implied moral sanction to his past record and whether, by our action, we endorse the extreme cruelties visited by the Soviet Union on enslaved peoples.

"In light of these thoughts, there was general concensus that, while we should refrain from any demonstrations of hostility, it would be right and proper that Mr. Khrushchev's arrival * * * be set aside as a day of prayer in all the churches of the land. * * * In like manner, special church services should be conducted in each city on the day of Mr. Khrushchev's visit."

Swift approval of the Moreell plan came from Evangelist Billy Graham who said: "I heartily endorse Admiral Moreell's proposal that Premier Khrushchev's day of arrival should occasion a day of prayer on the part of the Nation. * * * May this be an occasion that we conform our national life with our usual boast that God is our trust."

And finally, may those who love their country and detest the things Khrushchev stands for, do their very best to see that this ogre is paraded through empty streets.

Report on Missile Management

OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Congress a report just issued by the Military Operations Subcommittee of which I am chairman. This report is a factual study and systematic account of our major missile programs. It describes in some detail the resources, procedures, and special agencies that have been acquired or established for prosecuting this all-important missile effort. This report was unanimously approved by the full Committee on Government Operations under the distinguished leadership of Chairman WILLIAM L. DAWSON.

The missile programs play an increasingly vital role in the defensive strength of our country. The tremendous costs and expenditures involved in acquiring a missile capability alone demand that careful scrutiny be exercised in this field. The Military Operations Subcommittee has attempted to analyze the missile program from several points of view with objectivity and thoroughness.

We have carefully reviewed the agencies and committees and individual offices at the Department of Defense level over the past 10 years for directing and coordinating the missile effort. We have demonstrated the problems involved in attempting to achieve effective top-level control and the bewildering array of mechanisms that have been set up in the process. While this review may be critical, it is not carping. We have set forth the facts as we have found them. We have set them forth fairly and without partisanship or prejudice to any service.

The Military Operations Subcommittee has analyzed the procurement and management methods used by the military services in the missile programs. We have shown that the priorities assigned to these programs have often resulted in the creation of ad hoc agencies and the necessary circumvention of ordinary procurement procedures. While we have pointed out the tremendous waste involved, we have tried to show that the imminence of the Soviet threat and the urgent need for operational missiles were partly responsible.

The report sets forth a detailed account of the Air Force ballistic missile program starting with the Von Neumann committees' recommendations in 1953 that an ICBM program was feasible and should be undertaken.

After public hearings and visits to the Ballistic Missile Division on the west coast we have analyzed the circumstances under which Ramo-Wooldridge Corp. and its successor Space Technology Laboratories became enmeshed in the Air Force program. We have analyzed this company's relationship to the Air Force and the role it plays as a private concern sitting behind Government desks and helping to make governmental decisions. There has been a great deal of concern in the Congress and elsewhere over the tremendous power and responsibility exercised by Space Technology Laboratories. We have proposed that if this same relationship is to continue in the future the company must be converted into a nonprofit institution similar to the Rand Corp., the Jet Propulsion Laboratory, the Allied Physics Laboratory of Johns Hopkins University, and others.

We have spelled out in some detail the controversy over the Thor and Jupiter missiles. We have reviewed the recurring problem of duplication and overlapping roles and missions in the field of air defense. We have discussed the role of the military in space and the problems that have been created by the establishment of an Advanced Research Projects Agency in the Department of Defense and a new independent civilian space agency, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

The subcommittee has directed its attention primarily to land-based strategic missiles. We have found that the basic clash in the ballistic missile field is between the Army and the Air Force. After careful study we have concluded that duplication, waste and interservice rivalries will continue unless the Air Force and the Army "join hands in a single service effort." Our report has called upon the President to initiate studies looking to an Army-Air Force merger.

These strategic missiles are the decisive weapons of the coming decade—decisive for the strategy of deterrence and retaliation. These weapons, however, have no unique service orientation. Land-based missiles can be built and fired by the Air Force or the Army equally well. This creates a dilemma for both services. The Air Force now has operation control over all land-based strategic missiles, but this fact had nothing to do with the basic reasons for creating a separate Air Force. The Army faces a bleak future under prevailing roles and missions assignments which bar it from any part in deployment of the weapons that are to dominate global military strategy.

As the report states, "no amount of effort spent in clarifying roles and missions can overcome the ruthless logic of weapon technology."

While we believe that an Army-Air Force merger would by no means solve all of the problems of military organization and command relationships, it would solve many and lay the groundwork for the solution of others.

With the full cooperation of all the subcommittee members and the military services we have submitted a report which carefully and objectively tells a story which is of great concern to all of us. I believe that this report will cast light on little-known factors involved in the complex missile effort and contribute to everyone's understanding of the successes achieved and the problems that lie ahead. It will show that the nature and rapidity of missile and space technology demand a reappraisal of organizational arrangements in the Department of Defense.

Gasoline Tax Bill

OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have most vigorously supported and propose to continue to support the Federal highway construction program, which in my judgment is urgently needed to improve our national vehicular transportation travel and for the public safety.

When this program was first adopted by the Congress, adequate long-range financing measures were also adopted. While it is true that since that time, original costs of estimates on various parts of the program have increased, the original formula for raising and disbursing the funds required to advance and ultimately complete this great national project is just as sound today as when it was first proposed and adopted.

The diversion of earmarked funds has most unfortunately reduced receipts from the wide range of excise taxes which together with appropriated funds if undiverted would produce more than enough to meet all the Federal obligations under the road program and defray all necessary costs. There are several strong reasons why I do not believe that it is either necessary, or in the interest of sound principles of taxation, to impose additional taxes on gasoline.

In the first place, current gasoline taxes fall with especially heavy impact upon the American people. Heretofore, the gasoline tax had been considered to be a proper area for State taxation. In some States this taxation, imposed on gasoline at present constitutes more than 40 percent of the total purchase price of a gallon of gas.

To my mind, this is not taxation; it is a form of confiscation most oppressive in its effects. Secondly, the gasoline tax strikes at the more than 65 million automobile owners in the Nation who are required to use gas, and it thus imposes onerous taxation on ordinary consumers who are already very heavily taxed.

Moreover, as I pointed out above, it is entirely possible, feasible, equitable, and proper that Congress should and can finance this great roadbuilding program without further taxation on gasoline.

In addition, extensive roadbuilding construction overseas has been financed under the foreign aid program without the adoption of special taxes to pay the cost thereof.

I can see no logic and certainly no need or sound reason for placing additional special taxation of this kind upon American consumers. The Congress can and should provide all the funds needed to finance the program without the imposition of additional heavy special taxes.

I cannot possibly accept the argument that has been advanced here that failure to adopt this tax would bring the road program to a halt because Congress has readily at hand the means of financing the program on a solid, fundamental basis and should not hesitate to do so. This tax is discriminatory against the use of automobiles, other vehicles, and consumers, and against several great American industries and their employees and I cannot find any justification whatsoever in supporting it.

I think that the present taxes on the people and on business are already truly extortionate in many instances and are causing inestimable damage to our high American standards of living as well as to the fundamental operation of our great free enterprise system, and I express regret that Congress even proposes to add to these heavy burdens which are afflicting our people as a whole and seriously impairing the spirit and the incentives of private initiative. I greatly deplore this excessive taxation and I believe Congress should bring it down to fair, reasonable, unrepressive levels, if we have to stay here until Christmas to do it.

At this time, we need lower taxes, not higher taxes. If we could secure lower taxes, it would bring untold benefits to the Nation, to the American public, and to American businessmen, especially the small businessmen who are struggling so hard these days to make both ends meet. In addition, lower taxes would, in my humble judgment, produce higher revenues in the long run and thus assist in balancing the budget and reducing the national debt—two goals which I believe are of greatest import to the future prosperity and well-being of this Nation.

Why Not Tell Me Face to Face?—That Is the True American Way

OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend by remarks in the RECORD, I will include a letter I have written to a number of people in the Seventh Congressional District of Iowa which I have the honor to represent. This letter relates to certain unwarranted criticism by the Governor of Iowa of the position I have taken through the years on Federal appropriations for public works projects, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., August 27, 1959.

DEAR FRIEND: On last May 7 Herschel Loveless, Governor of the great State of Iowa, had a prepared statement read by another at a hearing of the House Public Works Appropriations Committee, of which I am the top Republican member. In that statement he listed six other States which had received more funds for public works than had the State of Iowa—for which he blamed Iowa Congressmen—but he failed to state that Iowa had received over the past years more public funds for flood control, river bank stabilization, soil conservation and valley watershed projects than had other States of the Union.

Congressman CARTER, of Iowa, a Democrat, was present at that hearing to testify in favor of several Iowa projects, and he heard the Governor's statement read—after which, he had this to say in part:

"Mr. CARTER. I want to make a record here expressing my personal gratitude as the Representative of the Fourth Congressional District to my friend, BEN JENSEN, whose district joins mine, for his efforts in behalf of the great Commonwealth of Iowa in this respect. He knows what he is talking about, and knows what he is doing." See page 1618 of the hearings.

Then on June 19 last, Mr. Loveless had another prepared statement submitted by another person to the Senate Public Works Committee of Appropriations. He saw fit to severely criticize me without naming me—but it is crystal clear he meant none other than BEN F. JENSEN. He criticized my speech of May 4, in which I exposed a well organized group of Communists and Socialists in the U.S.A., who planned and schemed for years to get control of our entire Government by establishing River Valley Authorities patterned after the Tennessee Valley Authority. In Mr. Loveless' prepared statement to that committee, and I quote in part from the hearings, page 257: "Recently a Member of Congress from Iowa has attacked the power programs of the Federal Government, which have been made possible by money appropriated by Congress. While he included all the Federal programs in his attack, he was especially vitriolic in his attack on TVA. As Governor of his State, I wish expressly to disassociate myself from his remarks. I am positive that he does not speak for the people of Iowa." Please find herewith enclosed my speech of May 4, which Mr. Loveless referred. I trust you will read every word, then decide for yourself which of us speaks best for the people of Iowa.

A number of Members of Congress, all senior to me in service, have told me that they had never known of a Governor of any State submitting a statement, or making a statement in person, to any committee of Congress critical of a Member of Congress from his own State. Such a performance was new to them. Hence, the Governor of the great State of Iowa has established some kind of a new record.

Facts are, that I have supported such federally financed projects as could be justified, and I have opposed such federally financed projects which it was plain to see could not be justified by facts and figures.

In Mr. Loveless' prepared statement to the Senate committee, he inferred that Iowa Congressmen should support the Public Works projects for all other States in order that Congressmen from other States would support Iowa projects. Had the House Public Works Appropriations Committee approved funds for all projects requested by 243 Members of Congress who appeared before our committee this session, along with 1150 interested people from every State in the Union, our Public Works Appropriations bill would have called for an expenditure of over $2½ billion instead of a little $1⅛ billion, which was the exact amount requested by President Eisenhower.

In closing may I say to you, it has afforded me no pleasure to write this letter, but I am sure the people of the Seventh Iowa District, whom I have the honor to represent in Congress, would expect me to state these facts in order to set the record straight.

Sincerely yours,

BEN F. JENSEN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I also wish to make reference to the action of our colleague from the State of Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] in inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 17, 1959, a statement that was highly critical of me and which included a reference to Governor Loveless' attack on me. Congressional courtesy requires that a Member be informed in advance if a personal attack or criticism is to be made by another Member, either on the floor of the House or through an insertion in the RECORD. Why not tell me face to face?

"What is in the heart, let the mouth speak." Thus was I taught by my parents. Because I have spoken out against the things which in my heart I believe to be contrary to the welfare of our beloved country, I have been attacked as an extremist and accused of being intemperate with respect to my contention that TVA is a socialistic autocratic empire within our free Republic.

On August 10, 1959, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I included excerpts from a newsletter of August 9, 1959, written by Mr. Thurman

Sensing, executive vice president of the Southern States Industrial Council, of Nashville, Tenn. This Tennessean, Mr. Sensing, is fully aware of the socialistic nature of the TVA, notwithstanding the statements to the contrary by Mr. EVINS or any other apologist for the TVA.

It is to be noted that Mr. EVINS made no reference whatsoever to the statements of Mr. Sensing, of Nashville, Tenn., located right in the heart of the TVA area, even though Mr. Sensing's statements were the basis for my remarks. It was this Tennessean who, with firsthand knowledge of the operations of TVA, said that—

A Senator has written the President a letter urging him by all means to have Mr. Khrushchev include a survey of the TVA in his tour of the United States. Well, if the thought is to make him feel at home, we should say that is a pretty good idea—because he will certainly find no free enterprise there. But what is Mr. Khrushchev himself to think, when we parade the TVA before him with pride, than that we are already aping his philosophy of state ownership and state control—and that we are already on our way toward making his prophecy about our grandchildren come true? We all want peace, yes; but must we obtain it at the expense of consorting with Communists and by the loss of our self-respect?

The prophecy referred to by Mr. Sensing was the Khrushchev statement that our grandchildren would be living under socialism.

Now I have no apologies whatsoever for my contentions that TVA is a socialistic autocratic empire within our free Republic; but I do think that Mr. EVINS might have let his readers know that the thought that Khrushchev would feel at home in making a survey of the TVA was not mine but originated in the TVA area itself.

The realization that TVA is socialistic is not a recent one. Speakers on the floor of the House at the time the original TVA bill was passed in 1933 referred to it in terms such as these:

Representative RICH. It is socialism and Russianism on a gigantic scale.

Representative EATON. This bill, and every bill like it is, is simply an attempt to graft on our American system the Russian idea and make the Government everything and the citizen nothing.

And upon its passage, Norman Thomas, the perennial socialistic candidate for President, so aptly described TVA as "the only genuinely socialistic act in the New Deal—a flower in the midst of weeds."

Nor am I alone in the thought that TVA has not been the blessing TVA and its proponents would have us believe. An outspoken editor of a newspaper published at Tupelo, Miss., in the TVA area itself had this to say after 20 years of TVA:

The time has come for TVA to back up and admit that the fastest growth in the South actually has taken place outside the TVA area and we who live within its borders are still as a whole just about the poorest people in America.

This of course would be quite true. For with the exception of giant projects like the Oak Ridge atomic energy plant that Uncle Sam has plunked down in Tennessee, the TVA area has shown less rapid industrial growth than several other portions of the South.

And in income, the TVA area is still dollar for dollar further behind the national average than it was in 1933 when the Tennessee Valley Authority was first established.

Mr. EVINS says if Mr. Khrushchev is invited to visit Tennessee, that his people will proudly show TVA to him—the world's greatest example of water resource development—where floods have been harnessed, navigation and commerce promoted, and where great hydroelectric power dams produce low-cost electricity for sale to the people and for the defense of our country."

Will Mr. EVINS and his fellow Tennesseans tell Mr. Khrushchev that the harnessing of the floods was done by permanently flooding hundreds of thousands of acres of the finest land in Tennessee, an action which a president of the University of Tennessee protested long and loud? Will Mr. Khrushchev be told that the so-called low-cost electricity was made possible only through a subsidy by the taxpayers of the Nation, who have furnished in round figures $2 billion—interest free and Federal tax free—for the construction of the TVA dams and powerplants? Will Mr. Khrushchev be told that the TVA, while claiming credit for pioneering farm electrification, for nearly 20 years consistently lagged behind the country as a whole in the percentage of farms electrified? Will it be pointed out to Mr. Khrushchev that only a few years ago a TVA spokesman admitted only one out of four farms in the TVA area had running water? This compares with a national average of more than double the TVA area, with a number of States in which more than 9 out of 10 of the farms have running water.

Mr. EVINS denounces what he refers to as the implications in my remarks of August 11, 1959 to the effect that the people of Tennessee are accepting and living with a communistic institution in their midst; that those who voted for, and the President who signed the recent revisions of the TVA Act, indicated acceptance of communistic ideas by such action. Of course, Mr. EVINS is free to read whatever implications he wants to into my statement or anyone else's statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but that does not make his interpretation a valid one. The record over the years of the TVA—from its inception in 1933 as a navigation and flood-control project with incidental development of electric power, to its present day growth into a gigantic autocratic electric power empire—is one of progressive usurpation of powers which TVA itself contended earlier it did not have nor contemplate. That the Congress later condoned such progressive usurpation of powers, over the years, does not make it right nor change the socialistic nature of TVA.

I did not say TVA was communistic, but if Mr. EVINS or anyone else believes there is so little difference between socialism and communism that they are inclined to treat the two as synonymous, that is their privilege. I would have to agree that there is not a great difference between the two. Socialism destroys freedom by degrees, communism kills freedom by one death blow.

Mr. EVINS in a reference to visits of Russian Communists to farms in the State of Iowa appears to classify the individualistic free enterprise of farming in Iowa with that of the socialistic power program of the TVA. Nothing could be farther apart. I am sure the people in my district realize that a farmer in Iowa who pays Federal taxes and who buys his own farm and provides for his own farm machinery, stock and other operating costs, with his own funds or funds borrowed from a bank, could not compete in the marketplace with a farmer who pays no Federal tax and who is furnished interest free Federal funds to buy his farm and to provide the capital to operate it. To say that this same comparable sort of program under which TVA has been operating is not socialistic is to deny Webster's or any other universal definition of socialism.

Mr. EVINS charges that I do a disservice to the people of Iowa when I point out the dangers of letting socialism—as exemplified in TVA—spread to the other river basins in the Nation. May I assure my colleague that an overwhelming majority of the people of Iowa back my stand against the expansion of socialism, which poses a constant threat to our great Nation and to individual freedom—the statements of Mr. EVINS and the Governor of Iowa notwithstanding.

Thousands of patriotic Americans from every section of the United States of America have requested a copy of my speech of May 4 last entitled "The Power Not To Tax Is Also the Power To Destroy—Socialism or Freedom for America." Because of this great demand, I now have a supply on hand and will be pleased to send a copy to anyone requesting same. I can assure you the reading of this speech will open the eyes of any patriotic American.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time an attempt has been made to ridicule me for being a conservative. I am proud to admit that I believe in being conservative with the inherent constitutional liberties of the American people and with the taxpayers' hard-earned dollars. I also believe each section of our great Nation should pay its fair share of the cost of government in keeping with the constitutional requirement. And that the Federal Government should not be called upon to provide for those services for which the people can provide for themselves.

If believing in and fighting for the Constitution of the United States and the individual freedoms which it provides is being an extremist, then I plead guilty to the charge. If belief in the American principle of free enterprise which has made this Nation great makes an extremist of me, as Mr. EVINS charges, then I plead guilty to the charge before man and God.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is better to be an extremist in the defense of the Constitution and the freedoms and principles for which it stands than to be a modern liberal. The American people have long ago correctly defined a modern liberal as one who is liberal with the people's inherent liberties and liberal with the taxpayers' hard-earned dollars and who desires the creation of an all-powerful autocratic central government which will look out for us from the cradle to the grave. Whether you call it socialism or some other name matters not. In my estimation it is contrary to the constitutional rights and principles upon which this great Nation was founded.

In regard to the recent passage of the so-called TVA bond bill which Mr. EVINS referred to, it is of interest to note that the entire Republican membership of the House Public Works Committee voted against reporting the bill out of the committee. And in the vote on final passage of this bill, 138 Republican Congressmen were joined by 32 Democrats in voting against passage. Only seven Republicans voted for passage. It can be seen that I am not alone by a long shot in my opposition to giving TVA practically unlimited power to operate without proper executive and congressional control. For those who think TVA is under proper control, I should like to end my statement with a quote from a recent issue of the Congressional Quarterly:

A TVA spokesman said TVA would not be bound to follow any recommendations that the President made about its expansion plans.

The Landrum-Griffin Bill Spells Out the Basic Rights of the Worker, the Union, the Business Community, and the American Public in General

OF

HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER

OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, few issues before the Congress of the United States have been as punctuated with emotion, heated controversy, misinformation, and contradiction as the labor reform measure of 1959.

Actually, one must sensibly analyze and appraise the structure of our present day economy and its basic goals to properly appraise the issue in its proper perspective.

We must not forget for 1 minute that everyone living in a democracy such as ours has certain rights. These rights are both legal and moral and must remain so if we are to preserve a proper balance in our society.

Can anyone deny that every man seeking to earn a living has the right to pursue his trade or occupation in the best interest of his own standard of living as well as for his family? Under his constitutional rights and freedoms he must not be forced to pay tribute nor be subjected to forced labor.

Labor unions and their leaders must be provided with the same right to peaceably organize and represent employees in collective bargaining to secure a good standard of wages and better working conditions for their members.

The business community, on the other hand, must be provided the right under the law to do business by the same standards and to show a profit for their investment of time, money, and effort.

The American public has the right to expect that these forces within our gigantic economy maintain a relationship which is not detrimental to the general welfare of the public.

Because in years gone by, management engaged in a selfish drive for power and profits with little regard for the welfare of the individual worker, labor unions organized for the collective protection of the workingman. How necessary this was when one considers the old days of the sweatshop, poor working conditions in the shop, child labor, and inadequate wages. It became necessary for Federal law to provide protection of the individual to be represented by a union and to permit the union to speak for him.

In 1935 Congress passed the Wagner Act at a time when organized labor was still struggling for survival. It was during this era that Congress gave union leaders an almost absolute right to picket, strike, or treat employers in any way they desired just as long as the objective was to bring employees into the union.

Laws have different effects upon our way of life under different economic conditions, and it is the job of Congress to constantly consider the rights of all segments of our economy, to protect the rights of all people and to maintain a degree of balance necessary to the best interests of the American public in general.

In 1947 Congress passed the Taft-Hartley law because this picture became so totally out of balance that establishing ground rules became necessary to the very survival of the business community. At any time the power of any group or individual is curtailed by law, one must expect the emotional shouting of that particular group. So it was at the time of Taft-Hartley. Union leaders charged that passage of this law would ruin organized labor and would create slave labor throughout industry if it were ever enacted. Many of the same folks who made these allegations were those who charged the House-passed Landrum-Griffin bill, which I supported, was a union buster and antilabor legislation.

Yet, 12 years after passage of what union bosses called the slave labor Taft-Hartley law, we find American labor with the highest wages and best working conditions in the history of this Nation. We find, too, union membership across the country has increased by nearly 3 million members since the Taft-Hartley law was passed. In all fairness, does it not seem understandable that the same wild charges against Landrum-Griffin failed to modify the judgment of nearly two-thirds of the membership of the House of Representatives?

It is ridiculous to say that the House-passed bill is in any manner of means a union buster. If it is ultimately enacted into law in a form resembling that which was approved by the House, it will do nothing more than cure some of the abuses which unfortunately put a stigma upon the many honest and sincere labor organizations.

The Landrum-Griffin bill does not interfere in any way with the collective bargaining rights of organized labor in a dispute between union and management.

It does not prohibit picketing in such disputes.

It does not attempt to tell any labor organization how it may spend its dues and funds.

It does not prevent proper recourse against management where legitimate contracts exist.

It does not curb the legitimate objectives of organized labor.

The Landrum-Griffin bill does provide equal rights to union members in the conduct of their union affairs.

It does provide freedom of speech and assembly for union members to meet and assemble with each other, to freely express their views and to speak up at union meetings without reprisal by union bosses. Makes the use of force or violence to deny such rights a crime.

It does prohibit increases in dues, initiation fees and assessments, or imposition of general or special assessments by labor bosses except by vote of the membership.

It does grant a union member the right to take court or administrative action against his union or its officers, after his right to a union hearing within a 4-month period is exercised.

It does guarantee workers the right to a hearing to prevent improper fine or penalty imposed by labor bosses.

It does provide for free and fair union elections by secret ballot, with opportunity for the nomination of candidates, elections at reasonable intervals, no reprisals for supporting any particular candidate, no use of union or employee money to influence elections, membership lists made available to candidates to insure membership of election information.

It does provide machinery for members to remove crooked officials by making possible court-ordered elections by members to remove such crooked union officials.

It does provide for the protection of union funds by making union officials give members a full accounting of union funds, with penalties for misuse of funds.

It does provide for the regulation of trusteeships and prevents power-hungry labor bosses from using dummy locals to force themselves on unwilling union members.

It does provide for the protection of economic strikers against the use of strikebreakers' votes in NLRB elections.

It does provide for allowance of union security agreements by building-trades unions, before hiring, with employees in the construction industry.

It does end no man's land, giving union member and employer a court or board remedy to enforce his rights under the law where NLRB refuses to hear such cases.

These are 12 things that the Landrum-Griffin reform bill does to benefit union members. These are 12 reasons why I joined with the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives in supporting it.

Federal Aviation Agency's Position on Serving Alcoholic Beverages in Aircraft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include my letter addressed to the Federal Aviation Agency and the reply received from Mr. E. R. Quesada, the administrator:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 22, 1959.

Re proposed amendments sections 40.371, 41.135, and 42.65 of the Civil Air Regulations.

Mr. JAMES T. PYLE,
Acting Administrator, Federal Aviation Agency, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PYLE: Pursuant to the notice set forth in the Federal Register, page 5424, Friday, July 3, 1959, my comments, suggestions, and recommendations relative to the foregoing matter (drinking and serving of alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft) are set forth below:

It is obvious to all that the common carriage of passengers by air entails certain risks and dangers peculiar to that form of travel. It is therefore incumbent upon everyone and especially your agency, which is concerned with safeguarding the lives and safety of passengers, crews and others, to discover, eliminate and prevent wherever and whenever possible all hazards to safe air travel.

The foregoing duty is required not only as to known hazards but also for the elimination of potential dangers, dangers which are obvious and apparent to people of ordinary and reasonable prudence. Any failure to eliminate such potential dangers is not only inexcusable but also culpable should injury or loss of life or damage to property result therefrom.

An intoxicated person is irresponsible and his behavior is unpredictable. Space on board an airplane is limited and confining and there is no room to avoid him, no policeman to restrain him and opportunities for imperiling the lives and safety of all aboard and on the ground are varied and many.

The mischief he can do and the tragedy that can ensue is irremediable and inexcusable.

The hazards and dangers to which all are exposed by the presence of an intoxicated person on board an airplane is clear and obvious and incidents have been testified to and your Agency is cognizant thereof.

A drunk on board an airplane is a clear and present danger to the lives and safety of everyone, everywhere, whether the inebriety is brought on by liquor carried onto the plane and there consumed or by liquor purchased on the airplane from the carrier by one who does not "appear to be intoxicated."

I feel that in recognizing the dangers that flow from intoxication aboard an airplane your Agency should adopt regulations that eliminate them by eliminating all possibility of intoxication on board the airplane.

The effect of the proposed regulation is not to eliminate the risk but simply to place the responsibility, in the event tragedy flows from it, onto the shoulders of anyone other than this Agency.

As long as you can regulate you can eliminate. There is no actual need for intoxicating beverages during flight nor is there a demand for such. All airlines would gladly discontinue serving such beverages provided the discontinuance would be complete for all airlines.

The Air Lines Pilots Association and the Stewards and Stewardesses Association have brought this subject up at their national conventions. Each has called for regulations forbidding the serving of alcoholic beverages on planes because it is a potential nuisance to passengers and crews alike and a threat to the safety of all.

In the opinion of those who serve and in the opinion of those being served there is no place for liquor in airplanes during flight.

The language of the proposed regulation could easily imply that: only airlines can serve nonintoxicating alcoholic beverages, the airlines derive a sizable revenue from the sale of intoxicants, and you encourage the consumption of intoxicants sold by airlines.

The proposed regulation places an unfair and unjust burden on the airline personnel by requiring them to determine if a person requesting service "is or appears to be intoxicated."

I fail to see how the proposed regulation eliminates the possibility of tragedy that can arise from a drunken act by one made drunk from being served intoxicants by the airline although he did not appear to be intoxicated when served.

To avoid an anomalous situation created by this Agency I recommend that the regulation be amended to read as follows:

"No person shall drink any alcoholic beverage aboard an air carrier aircraft while in flight within the United States."

The actual amount of time in flight is so short that the total prohibition of the use of intoxicants during flight will create no hardship on anyone, even the habitual user.

Sincerely yours,

——— ———.

FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., August 31, 1959.

HON. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LANE: This is in reply to your letter of July 22, 1959, concerning proposed amendments to sections 40.371, 41.135, and 42.65 of the Civil Air Regulations.

I enclose for your information a copy of a statement presented by the Federal Aviation Agency to the Subcommittee on Aviation and Transportation of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on July 28, 1959. It was directed to several bills now pending in the Congress. These bills are designed to prohibit the sale or furnishing of alcoholic beverages on aircraft while in flight between points in the United States. The statement contains the reasons which led to the proposed amendments to the Civil Air Regulations referred to above.

Under the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, this Agency is charged with fostering development and safety in civil aviation. Section 601 of the act vests broad general responsibility for, and control over, safety in flight in civil aviation in the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency. Therefore, this Agency's approach to the practice of serving alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft has been directed to the question of whether there was any safety problem involved. To date, no factual information has been discovered which demonstrates that the practice of serving alcoholic beverages while in flight directly affects safety in the operation of air carrier aircraft.

As indicated in the statement, some incidents have been discovered which could have had an adverse effect upon safety. These were caused by passengers who drank from their own bottle during the course of a flight, or by those who had consumed a considerable quantity of alcohol prior to boarding a flight. The proposed amendments to the Civil Air Regulations are designed to provide the necessary control in these needed areas with a minimal interference to personal freedom. This Agency feels that issuance of amendments to the Civil Air Regulations referred to above will constitute an effective deterrent, and discharge our responsibility with respect to safety.

If future experience demonstrates that safety considerations require further regulation, this Agency can and will issue such regulations.

Thank you for your interest in this important matter.

Sincerely,

JAMES T. PYLE,
Deputy.
For E. R. QUESADA, Administrator.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE JAMES T. PYLE, DEPUTY ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY, PRESENTED TUESDAY, JULY 28, 1959, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON AVIATION AND TRANSPORTATION OF THE HOUSE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMITTEE, WITH RESPECT TO H.R. 169, 3716, 7135, 7643, 1075, 6824, 7270, AND 8076

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is James T. Pyle, Deputy Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency. The Federal Aviation Agency is happy to have the opportunity to appear before this subcommittee for the purpose of commenting with respect to all of these bills which deal with prohibiting the sale or furnishing of alcoholic beverages by air carriers to passengers on aircraft while in flight between points in the United States.

Each of these bills would amend section 610 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 by adding a new subsection which would prohibit the practice of selling or furnishing alcoholic beverages to airline passengers and crews while in flight within the United States. There is some variation in the language in the different bills, but the effect and intent of all of them is the same.

The Federal Aviation Agency believes that the question of controlling the serving of alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft is an important one. It has been given careful consideration and study by this Agency. Our approach was not directed to drinking as a social problem, but rather to determine whether there was a safety problem, since this is the concern of our Agency.

The Civil Aeronautics Administration, one of our predecessor agencies, conducted a survey to determine whether the practice of serving alcoholic beverages while in flight might in any way have an adverse effect upon safety. The results of this survey did not reveal any factual information or specific incidents which were found directly to affect safety in the operation of air carrier aircraft. However, some instances were discovered, with respect to passengers, which were of a type that could have an adverse effect upon safety. A study of such instances indicated that almost uniformly they were caused by passengers who had either consumed a considerable quantity of alcoholic beverages prior to boarding a flight, or by those who drank from their own bottles during the course of a flight. No such problem was found with respect to crews or flight attendants.

As a result of our study, it does not appear necessary to prohibit the consumption of alcoholic beverages by passengers aboard air carrier aircraft in order to meet the safety requirements. This Agency feels that safety needs can be satisfactorily met by permitting consumption of such beverages by those who wish to have them, but providing sufficient control so that no hazard will be created. By so doing, we will interfere as little as possible with the personal freedom of passengers and at the same time prevent abuses that would possibly create a hazardous situation.

Under these circumstances this Agency felt that some regulatory control may be required for safety purposes. This can be done under present law. Section 601 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 vests broad general responsibility for, and control over, safety in flight in civil aviation in the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency. Under this broad responsibility, safety regulations are promulgated. This Agency recognizes that as larger and faster aircraft come into service with an increase in the number of passengers carried, drinking among passengers might conceivably result in situations where flight attendants and crews would be distracted from their duties. This could create a safety problem.

Accordingly, the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency has issued a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking which will result in the promulgation of a safety regulation unless good cause is shown to the contrary. This regulation would prohibit the consumption of alcoholic beverages aboard air carrier aircraft, unless such liquor is served by the air carrier, and would further provide that no air carrier shall serve alcoholic beverages aboard an aircraft to a person who is in a state of intoxication, or appears to be intoxicated. Violations of this regulation by either passengers or an air carrier could result in the infliction of a civil penalty under section 901(a) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 which could mean a fine not exceeding $1,000.

The above regulation would constitute an effective deterrent. If in the future it can be demonstrated that safety considerations require further regulation of the use of alcoholic beverages by passengers during the course of a flight, then this Agency can and will issue such regulations.

It thus appears that the purpose for which all of these bills have been drafted can be accomplished by regulation under existing law. Therefore, the Federal Aviation Agency can see no need for the enactment of any of these bills.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that it interposes no objection to the submission of this statement to your subcommittee.

Under Self-Help Provision of Wool Act Woolgrowers Are Helping Solve Their Own Probems

OF
HON. O. C. FISHER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, during the month of September the woolgrowers of America are voting in a national referendum on the question of allowing deductions of 1 cent per pound from incentive payments in order to finance continued promotion, advertisement, and merchandizing of wool and lamb.

Under the Wool Act certain incentive payments are made annually to growers to encourage more sheep production in this country. These payments are derived solely from import duties from wool that is brought in from foreign countries to compete on our own domestic markets. And the 1 cent deducted for promotion is taken from the money provided by the import fees. The incentive level for wool is established each year by the Secretary of Agriculture at a figure calculated to allow for the deduction and at the same time provide encouragement and incentive for our American growers, in the national interest, to increase the sheep population of this country.

This promotion program is handled by the American Sheep Producers Council, headed by Mr. Don Clyde, of Utah, an able grower who is dedicated to the best interest of our woolgrowers. And even though during the 4 years the program has been in effect—there has hardly been enough time to observe its capabilities—definite improvement has been noted.

Despite the great drought and the world depression in the textile field, our sheep population has increased by 1,227,000, according to the Department of Agriculture. During the first third of 1959 there has been a 40-percent increase in wool consumption over the same period during the preceding year; and prices have jumped more than 27 percent in the first half of 1959.

NEED FOR PROMOTION EVIDENT FROM INROADS IN TEXTILES BY SYNTHETICS

The necessity for an effective promotion program is self-evident when we look at the competition record in recent years with the manmade fibers. The Department of Agriculture informs me that in 1921 apparel wool accounted for 10 percent of all fabrics consumed in this country, in 1937 it was 6.3 percent, and in 1958 it had dropped to only 3.7 percent. This despite some improvement already noted as a result of promotion and advertisement by the American Sheep Producers Council.

During that same period the synthetics or manmade fibers accounted for 0.6 percent in 1921 of all fabrics consumed in this country; in 1937 it was 6.9 percent, and in 1958 it had reached 28.6 percent.

It is significant, too, that in 1 year the manufacturers of synthetics spend nearly $25 million in promoting and advertising their manmade fibers. This is more than woolgrowers have spent in this country during the life of their industry.

WOOL ACT RENEWAL LAST YEAR INCLUDED SELF-HELP PROVISION

Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that after a 4-year trial run, the Wool Act was last year extended by the Congress for an additional 3 years. The act included section 708, which authorizes the deductions for promotion.

Many will recall that one of the selling points in obtaining an extension of the law was section 708. It was pointed out then that here was a provision which enables the growers, by their own voluntary agreement if they should by a two-thirds vote choose to do so, to help themselves to regain their rightful place in our national economy.

Some 94 organizations directly connected with the sheep owners and all general farm organizations, with but one possible exception, gave unqualified support for the renewal of the Wool Act with section 708, the self-help provision, included.

Only the American Farm Bureau entertained any misgivings about the need for section 708. The Congress, being anxious to have the growers do more for themselves toward the solution of their own problems, gave little heed to objections raised against section 708, and these objections were promptly discounted and overruled.

Thus, it was quite evident that the Congress felt that if the Government was to continue to help support the woolgrowers, the growers would be expected to continue to help support themselves through the continued use of section 708.

NEUTRAL POSITION PROMISED BY FARM BUREAU LAST YEAR ON ISSUE POSED BY REFERENDUM

Last year when the Wool Act was before the Congress for renewal the Farm Bureau representative who was testifying before the House Committee on Agriculture on the question of extension, Mr. Frank Wooley, the Farm Bureau spokesman, testified:

> Well, we take the position in the American Farm Bureau Federation, Mr. Hill, that it is our responsibility to present as many facts as we can through all of our various media to the farmers as to what the pros and cons are with respect to any referendum that is put to them for a vote. We do not take the point of view that it is our responsibility, we think it is improper on our part, to tell them how they are to vote. We just merely do everything we can to see that they understand that a vote is being taken, and that it is in the interest of everyone to know the issues on both sides, and we do everything we can to urge that they vote with respect to the subject.

Unfortunately, however, in some recent releases on the issue being decided by the referendum, the Farm Bureau has publicized some information that has not told the entire story. Indeed some of the published figures I have seen have been very misleading in regard to the success of the promotion program under section 708. Perhaps this has been an inadvertence, but nevertheless it is not in keeping with the policy position outlined by Mr. Wooley in his testimony.

Let me give one or two examples of what I mean. As one example, the Farm Bureau has in effect pulled two figures out of the air to show that from 1954 to 1958 the U.S. farm price of wool dropped 31.6 percent, but failed to state further that wool prices in 1958 dropped to an extremely low point because of prices of wool all over the world were extremely depressed due, as I previously pointed out, to a worldwide textile recession. Except for the promotion program, the prices might very well have dropped even more.

Moreover, in order to get the full picture before our growers the Farm Bureau should have gone further and explained that in the last 6 months the farm price of wool has increased 27.4 percent and that in the first third of this year, wool consumption increased 39.5 percent over the same period of 1958. Without a recital of these facts, the information put out by the Farm Bureau was obviously very deceptive and misleading to our wool growers.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the American Farm Bureau, the great farm organization that it is, does not want to see man-made fibers, with their huge advertising budgets, make even further inroads into the fiber field enjoyed by wool, cotton, and other superior natural fibers.

We have our backs to the wall in this fiber battle, and we need to marshal all the support obtainable from all organizations interested in our sheep industry.

Berkeley County, W. Va., War Memorial Park Dedicated; Popular Recreational Area Is Debt Free

OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, it was my privilege to have participated in the dedication for the Berkeley County War Memorial Park near Martinsburg, W. Va., Saturday, August 29, 1959.

The program for this significant event contained a history of the park, including these cogent sentences:

The Berkeley County War Memorial Park stands today as both a memorial to our community's honored war dead and as a tribute to the cooperation of thousands of our citizens who have made the park possible. * * * The memorialization has been chiefly in the planting of maple trees and installation of individual markers, one to each of the war dead. The park, a suitable recreational area that also is a living memorial to the nearly 200 youths who gave their lives in World Wars I and II, contains about 20 acres of land and was purchased for $15,000. More than $100,000 in cash has been contributed toward development of the park during the past 13 years, plus thousands of dollars' worth of volunteer labor and free material. * * * All money for the park development has been obtained through voluntary contributions without a cent coming from any governmental agency. * * * Dedication has been long delayed but it comes at a time when the park is reaching new peaks of popularity and when it stands debt free.

Appropriately, the present officers and the original members of the board of the Berkeley County War Memorial Association, Inc., and others who contributed much to the successful development of the park and to its dedication program, were recognized in the historical review, including Paul B. Martin, president of the park board and the mayor of Martinsburg when the original park committee was appointed on August 17, 1946; Garland L. Dunn, chairman of the board; Ernest H. McKee, vice president; Donald G. Rentch, secretary; Thom R. Keller, treasurer; Douglas Shipley and Mrs. Harry L. Reeves, members of the original mayor's committee and the original board; Russell J. Scrivener, Lovell Alderton, Rev. Frederick F. Bush, Jr., and Charles V. Sullivan of the original mayor's committee; Lacy I. Rice, Judge D. H. Rodgers, Frank C. Thomas, Philip T. Seibert, Lou Cohen, Rev. Father George Huber, Mrs. Paul Hammann, M. L. Depenbrock, Mrs. Jacob Schleuss, Harry C. Hammann, Mrs. C. A. Kitchell, and John Skelly of the original board.

Preceding the dedication program there were band concerts by Musselman and Martinsburg High School Bands, and the Martinsburg Municipal Band.

In response to the association's invitation, I delivered the dedicatory address.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that extracts from my speech be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ADDRESS BY SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH, DEMOCRAT, OF WEST VIRGINIA, AT THE DEDICATION OF THE BERKELEY COUNTY WAR MEMORIAL PARK, MARTINSBURG, W. VA., AUGUST 29, 1959

I am strengthened as I look about me and see the fruits of 13 years of community endeavor in your memorial park. We are gathered to dedicate this effort to the memory of your loved ones who gave their lives in freedom's cause. Their names and the remembrance of their deeds will be perpetuated in the life of this area. They died that our Nation's future might be more secure. It is fitting, therefore, that this memorial to your sons and brothers also looks to the future. Though monuments in stone and bronze may have their place, you could offer no finer tribute to the valiant dead than this shrine which so enriches the lives of those they left behind.

In setting aside these 20 acres—in thus dedicating this ground, you have consecrated it to the living as well as the dead. In this way we help to keep alive and fresh the values and ideals of those who fought and died. This is our charge and our responsibility.

Yet, our obligation to those young men does not end with the dedication of this ground today. The Berkeley County Memorial Park is but a beginning of the fulfillment of our trust. Our responsibilities will be discharged only when we have also consecrated our lives to tasks worthy of the human sacrifices that have already been made.

MEANING OF SACRIFICE

Our words can but revive the memories of our departed loved ones; but it is our actions and our lives which will continue to keep alive the meaning of their sacrifice. The courageous young men to whom we give our homage offered their blood and their lives in the cause of humanity—in the right of the individual to achieve for himself a way of freedom and dignity. This is the idea which in the past has given the thrust to American life. More than any other idea, it continues to give meaning and vitality to our present life, and it has been the ultimate goal toward which man's constant progress through the centuries has been directed. Thus, the journey toward the American dream has been man's journey toward the full humanity of man. Yet the struggle has not ended.

It has been a dispiriting and tragic disillusionment for Americans, and for citizens of other free nations as well, to see in the years since the end of World War II, the extinguishment of the ideals of freedom and individual dignity among the millions of people under the domination of the Soviet Union and Communist China. In the face of such terrifying repression and assaults upon the integrity of man, we might, in moments of weakness, wonder if it has been worth the cost in blood and treasure.

For those who gave their lives in the cause of human freedom, we find assurance in the words of the Gospel (John IV, 14) that "* * * whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." While this offers consolation to those who have lost friends and members of our families, it does not relieve us of the responsibility of carrying on their struggle and thus, in some measure, giving meaning to their sacrifice. Only in this way can we truly memorialize those who gave the full measure of devotion to their country.

When the great American poet, Walt Whitman, was confronted by the tragic death of President Lincoln he sought in some manner—as did the people of the Nation as a whole—to find a meaning in such an irrational and devastating event. Whitman solved his problem in the beautiful and moving poem, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloomed." Here he indicated that, since Lincoln had given his life for the Union, the only meaningful manner in which one could acknowledge his death was to contribute to the growth of the Union and the ideals for which the President had worked and died. These the poet symbolized in the sprig of green lilacs which he brought to the deceased President as a token of his commitment to the future and to the promise of growth and creativity that the future holds.

LIVING COMMUNITY TRIBUTE

This useful memorial park is your sprig of lilac. In the creation of this center you have also created a richer and better community. For families and for single folk, for young and for old, this park offers opportunities for a healthier and more wholesome life. And for the individual who may simply want to leave the indoors for a few minutes' contemplation of the wonder of sky and clouds, of the miracle of youth and the sound of laughter, it offers balm to the heart and a lift to the spirit. And for other fortunate ones it may offer what Nature offered to the poet, William Cullen Bryant, when he wrote:

"To him who in the love of Nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware."

This park thus exists as a living community tribute to the sacrifices of the sons of Berkeley County. Yet we may not rest with this. Each of us, individually, has the responsibility to consecrate his life to the fulfillment of the American dream if those sacrifices are not to have been in vain.

And what is this dream? It is what brought generations of men and women from Europe across 3,000 miles of ocean to settle on unknown shores. It is what brought later generations of men and women to cross our own Alleghenies into the great valley of the Midwest, and from there up across the high plains to the Sierras and finally to the Pacific Ocean itself. It is the dream embodied in our own State motto: "Mountaineers Always Free."

Men and women did not leave Europe because of what they feared and hated; they came to America because of what they loved and hoped. Later, when they left the eastern seaboard and started the long trek westward, they departed, not because they despised the East, but because they were drawn to the West by challenge and by belief—by the belief that they could create a future of greater worth and human dignity. This belief in the possibilities of man has shaped the destiny of America.

It is true that there were intolerances and repressions. But the love and the faith outlived them. The belief in freedom of conscience outlived the theocracy of colonial Massachusetts. And the assurance in the dignity of the individual blotted out the misunderstanding of 200 years.

LOVE AND HOPE—NOT FEAR

Until recently we Americans have lived in the light of what we have loved and hoped, not what we have feared. For 300 years we followed the American dream of the future. And that dream became real. It became real in the land that Tom Jefferson and Sam Adams found—in the land that Emerson and Whitman explored—in the land of the free human spirit with eyes aimed at the future. For 300 years this was the dream that we lived and loved.

But in recent years we have become guided less by our loves and hopes than by our fears. Less by our love of America than by our fear of Russia. Less by the hope and possibilities of the future, than by the fear and dangers of the future.

It is a sick man who lives, not by his loves, but by his fears. Thus so, it is true of a nation.

At the height of our power, the most common talk is about our fears—our fear of the Soviet Union, our fear of inflation, our fear of an unbalanced budget, our fear of the power of organized labor.

Where is the talk, and where is the faith in the vision and the fulfillment of the dream? I said a moment ago that the dream had become real. While that is true, it does not mean that the task is completed. Men are not truly free when they and their families live in squalor and poverty. Children are not educated for freedom when our schools are inadequate. Future generations will not be free if we squander the natural resources on which freedom is maintained. In brief, the challenge of the future and the hope of the future are still before us. "The American journey," as the poet, Archibald MacLeish stated, "has not ended. America is never accomplished, America is always still to build; for men, as long as they are truly men, will dream of man's fulfillment."

This, then, is the memorial we must dedicate as individuals: to rekindle the faith in the American future, and to live with a renewed vision of the possibilities of man. We Americans have reason thus to live; whether we have the will depends upon the individual heart.

OF

HON. E. Y. BERRY

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my final report for the 1st session of the 86th Congress to the people of the Second Congressional District, South Dakota.

It is as follows:

Each year as the session draws to a close, I have attempted to supplement my regular monthly reports to you with a final report in which I endeavor to summarize what has been done by Congress, what should have been done, and the overall picture as it hangs in the national frame.

In sizing up the national picture, we should recall first that the Nation and the world are at peace. True—there are troubled spots—always have been and always will be—but international tension is lower today than at any time since I came to Washington over 8 years ago when a Korean war was in full bloom.

Historians marked the date last week as 20 years since Hitler had moved his armies into World War II. It was 21 years before then that the Kaiser moved his troops into World War I. Each war resulted primarily because the Allies had compromised their positions rather than taking a firm stand and backing up that position with strength.

Today at the end of the present 20-year period, the leader of the potential enemy has asked to come to our shores, not with armies, but with his wife and family, to visit a nation and to visit a President who, upon taking over the reigns of state, served an ultimatum from a position of strength and has refused to compromise one word of that ultimatum, one acre of that ground, or one citizen of that area.

A recent visit with that President convinces me this position will in no way be altered and none of the fundamental principles that have kept the peace will be compromised when the two men sit down across the table from each other to visit. President Eisenhower does not bluster and blow as the bulky dictator of the Soviet Union, but neither does he cringe from pressure or politics. Should anyone doubt that, they should read his record of holding the brakes on a spending-pledged, two-thirds Democrat majority in the 86th Congress.

No—the Khrushchev visit can do no harm—it could do good. He will return to his Communist empire with a firsthand knowledge of the strength of this country—not just the military strength, but the economic and social and spiritual strength of a great, free, Christian Nation.

When I first came to Washington, I heard the then General Eisenhower make the statement that the military is only the cutting edge of the sword, that the strength of the blade back of that cutting edge is the economy of the country. A month ago I had breakfast with the now President Eisenhower and heard him relate the remarks of Ludwig Erhardt of Germany, who told the President the greatest fear of their people was not recessions, but inflation; that they had experienced inflation at its worst; that the worst kind of hard times comes when the housewife must take a market basket full of money to the grocery store to buy a purse full of groceries.

It is my privilege, as your representative, to cast your vote for you, and I have cast that vote not only to strengthen the President's hand in forcing a balanced budget, but to go even further than the President has gone in a determined effort to return fiscal responsibility to the Nation, thereby strengthening the blade back of that cutting edge and preventing the day when a basket full of money is required for a purse full of groceries.

I believe that fiscal responsibility is measured not only by a balanced budget, but likewise in seeing that the taxpayers get their money's worth for the tax dollar that is expended. I have opposed programs that will unbalance the budget, and I have opposed programs where I feel the taxpayer will not get his money's worth.

I hope you will read the enclosed remarks which I made on the House floor during debate on several issues. There I have pointed out some of my fears based upon the trends of the times. Space in this report prohibits more than just a summary, but in this summary I would remind you again that it is Congress which makes the laws, it is Congress which appropriates the money. When those laws are made, when those appropriations are passed, the President and the executive branch have no alternative but to execute the laws which Congress has enacted.

Representative CLARENCE CANNON, Democrat, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, recently pointed out that in each year since 1939 the value of the dollar has decreased with the exceptions of 1949 and 1955. I would point out that these two years followed the only two balanced budgets since 1939—the work of the two Republican Congresses, the 80th and the 83d. This is proof that it can be done, that the devaluation of the dollar can be stopped if Congress has the will to live within the national income.

It was to help strengthen the hand of the President and force a spending-bent Congress to live within the national income that I voted to sustain the President's vetoes in an effort to not only bring those particular bills more in line with national needs, but at the same time quell the overall thirst for drinking at the tempting spring of inflation.

It was to cut spending below the national income that I voted against such frills as a new congressional office building; public parking lots; Federal assistance to communities sponsoring sporting events; the unnecessary grant-in-aid programs for constructing business establishments at airport terminals; public housing; city slum clearance; area redevelopment; construction of city sewage systems; and a dozen other similar programs which could and should be financed by private enterprise or local governmental units.

It was to reduce similar programs abroad that I voted against the $3.1 billion foreign aid bill. I also opposed permitting the International Bank and Monetary Fund, as well as the Federal Aviation Agency and the Development Loan Administration, from drawing directly on the Federal Treasury to fund department expenditures rather than obtaining appropriations from Congress—a procedure known as back door spending that has cost the taxpayers almost $8 billion annually.

Our chickens are coming home to roost from another field. After going off the gold standard, a certain confidence was maintained in the dollar through the knowledge that large gold supplies were buried at Fort Knox. Because of inflation at home and the effect of the reciprocal trade policies, our gold supplies are slipping away. As of July 1, our gold stock stood at $20.5 billion. Of that amount, foreign governments and nationals owned $14.9 billion, leaving a domestic gold reserve of $5.6 billion. This is due largely to the fact that we have, for the first time in modern years, lost the balance of trade. We are buying more foreign goods and selling less abroad. I have urged a return to the gold standard to right this wrong.

The 86th Congress made history in adopting the Landrum-Griffin labor reform bill. Its passage was not a personal victory for the President, the Republicans, nor the conservative Democrats. It was simply an example of the people asserting their rights when sufficiently aroused.

The powerful and well-financed labor bosses could not have been overcome without the people demanding (1) that legislation be passed which would drive racketeering and corruption from the ranks of organized labor, and (2) that the rights of the individual union member be protected.

The new law does these things. It contains the McClellan "Bill of Rights" with criminal enforcement, then it adds protection to the public as well through the curbing of secondary boycotts, organizational and recognition picketing, and in settling the "no man's land" between State and Federal jurisdiction.

The 86th Congress designed "five rows of six and four rows of five" stars in Old Glory with the addition of Hawaii as the 50th State. It continued the interstate highway program through a 22-month increase in the gasoline tax; increased the interest rate on savings bonds; plugged loopholes in the law on obscene mail; exempted out-of-State companies from State taxation in certain cases; corrected "equal time," confusing regulations for radio and TV stations; etc.

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker—

We know when moons shall wane
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea
When autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain
But "Death, Oh" who shall teach us when to look for thee?

Leaves have their time to fall
And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath
And stars to set—but all
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

Holy Scripture tells us when Abner, son of Ner, was killed and the word was brought back to King David, he said:

And the King said unto his servants, Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?

In a similar vein of thought, residents of Altoona, Pa., and those associated with the late Philip H. Handmaker in his farflung business enterprises realized through shock and sorrow that his sudden death on August 9, 1959, was indeed an irreparable loss.

Phil, as he was known to his legion of friends and business acquaintances, was born August 7, 1903, in Russia. At an early age he came with his parents to America where the family settled in Pittsburgh, Pa. He began his business career in Altoona, Pa., in 1925 and despite a humble beginning in true Horatio Alger fashion he reaped phenomenal success in the business world, thus becoming a symbol of the benefits to be derived from the American system of free enterprise.

At the conclusion of this tribute to my departed friend, I wish to include as part of my remarks the obituary of the late Philip Henry Handmaker which appeared in the August 10, 1959, issue of the Altoona Mirror, together with tributes of love and respect from his associates, and by Rabbi J. H. Henderson, which appeared in later issues of the Altoona Mirror. The authors enjoyed the rewarding privilege of association and friendship with Phil Handmaker, and their expressions reflect their love and admiration for his many fine qualities.

Phil Handmaker by his short, yet fruitful life fully deserved the glowing tributes accorded him for he left a proud heritage to his family and his friends—the only heritage that is really worthwhile—an honored name. Truly, as one of the prophets of old said:

He lived humbly, did justly, and walked reverently with God.

As a member of Agudath Achim Synagogue and Temple Beth Israel in Altoona, Pa., his deep faith in God was manifested by his devout manner in caring for his own spiritual welfare aided by his firm adherence to the tenets of his ancient faith.

By his exemplary life which portrayed his deep-rooted convictions that it is mandatory to accept the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God as eternal truths, he brought honor to his age and his people.

Divine providence blessed him with God-fearing parents who bent upon giving their children every possible advantage toiled and sacrificed like countless other immigrant families who have come to America's shores seeking liberty, freedom, and equal opportunity for all God's children.

Fortified by their divine faith which was supplemented by toil, sacrifice, and perseverance, their love and solicitude for their children made an indelible impression on their son, Phil, and provided him with added inspiration to serve as an additional incentive in his successful effort in scaling the heights of the business world. It is of such loving and self-sacrificing parents that the poet has said:

Those distant seas I have not crossed
Bright jewels I never wore
The prizes now forever lost
And comforts languished for—
The rich rewards for which men sigh
That I have never won
The years, the hopes, the dreams go by
Are found in you, my son.

One of the many fine qualities that Phil Handmaker possessed was the confidence he instilled in those fortunate to have crossed his path in life. He had the happy faculty of being able through his kindness to others to encourage his friends and associates to feel free to discuss their problems with him. This admirable trait of character is expressed by the poet when he said:

Oh, the comfort, the inexpressible comfort, of feeling safe with a person,
Having neither to weigh thoughts nor words
But pouring them all out, chaff and grain together
Confident that a faithful hand will take them
And sift them, keep what is worth keeping,
And with the breath of love and kindness blow the rest away.

Those of us in central Pennsylvania, who knew Phil Handmaker intimately, recognized and appreciated his great civic consciousness and the insatiable desire he had for advancing the best interests of the city of Altoona and Blair County. That area of Pennsylvania owed him an undying debt of gratitude for his great contribution toward its progress and welfare.

It is common knowledge and a striking illustration of his depth of character that even though Phil was privileged to walk and sit with the mighty, he enjoyed the reputation of never losing the common touch despite his spectacular success in the realm of business. Shunning ostentation and declining to bask in the glare and glamour of publicity, his innumerable acts of charity unheralded and unsung and dispensed without regard to race, color or creed, brought rays of sunshine into the bleak and barren lives of the poor, the underprivileged and the downtrodden.

Such golden nuggets of kindly deeds are treasured and will live forever in the hearts of the lowly and needy of society whose lives he touched. They are an inperishable monument to the memory of such a great American who by his altruistic deeds gives credence to the thoughts expressed in two lines of a poem by the celebrated English poet, William Wordsworth:

The best portions of a man's life—
His little nameless acts of kindness and love.

It can be truly said that Phil's death at the zenith of his career was a tragic loss to his loved ones and to the community, State, and Nation. His noble character may be summed up in the words of Lord Byron:

He had kept the whiteness of his soul, and thus men over him wept.

From a personal standpoint, the death of Phil Handmaker has meant the loss of a cherished friend of many years. His passing recalls to mind the words of the poet—

A friend has passed across the bay,
So wide and vast and put away,
The mortal form that held his breath;
But through the storm that men call death
Erect and straight, unstained by years
At heaven's gate a man appears.

Sharing the sorrow voiced by countless friends and acquaintances, I joined them in tendering sincere expressions of deepest sympathy to his devoted wife, Mollie, their four daughters, and other members of the immediate family.

In conclusion, Phil Handmaker's life was a virtual mirror in which were reflected the many fine qualities of his richly gifted soul. These outstanding personal characteristics enshrine him in the minds and hearts of those privileged to have crossed paths with him in the daily stream of life. His manner of daily living portrayed his adherence to the deathless tradition of the ancient faith of a people who were "keepers of the word" and "the bearers of the commandments."

Thus, it is fitting to say that in the best traditions of the Judaic-Christian precept of living by the word of God, the late Phil Handmaker by his short, yet fruitful life fulfilled the beautiful prayer of St. Francis of Assisi:

Lord, make me an instrument of Thy peace;
Where there is hatred, let me sow love;
Where there is injury, pardon;
Where there is doubt, faith;
Where there is despair, hope;
Where there is darkness, light;
Where there is sadness, joy.

CITY AUTO PARTS SUPPLY COMPANY PRESIDENT DIES

Philip H. Handmaker, 57, of 3004 Second Avenue, president of the Automotive Supply Co., and chairman of the Altoona Bus

Authority, died in the Altoona Hospital at 9:45 a.m. yesterday after a heart attack.

Mr. Handmaker, whose Automotive Supply firm had many branches throughout Pennsylvania, had large holdings throughout the United States, including a traction firm in Minneapolis, Minn.

Relatives reported he awakened Saturday morning complaining of indigestion. He was admitted to the hospital during the morning.

Born August 7, 1903, in Russia, he was the son of Harry and Sophie (Romick) Handmaker. His career began in Altoona as manager of the Firestone Service Store at 12th Avenue and 15th Street.

He left Firestone to form the Automotive Supply Co. The firm moved in 1937 to its present building at 1917 Margaret Avenue.

Surviving are his wife, Mollie and following daughters: Mrs. Harriet Bregman of Altoona, Mrs. Reitz Kaplan of Pittsburgh, Mrs. Audrey Goldstein of Johnstown and Mrs. Barbara Kaminsky of Ann Arbor, Mich., and nine grandchildren.

Also surviving are two brothers and four sisters: Isaac H. of Tucson, Ariz.: Meyer of Pittsburgh, Mrs. Jean Sparks of Altoona, Mrs. Mary Supowitz of Tucson, Mrs. Saua Auxwerwitz of Harrisburg and Mrs. Josephine Feldman of Pittsburgh.

Mr. Handmaker was a member of Agudath Achim Synagogue and Temple Beth Israel, the Elks and the Altoona Kiwanis Club.

Interment was made in Pittsburgh today.

MAN OF WIDE INTERESTS

EDITOR OF THE ALTOONA MIRROR:

Few men attain the success in the business world as that achieved by Philip Henry Handmaker whose sudden death on August 9, 1959, came as a distinct blow to his countless friends and business associates.

As a small boy, Phil came to this country with his parents from his native Russia, the family locating in Pittsburgh. With meager book learning, he became a giant of business, a true example of a self-made man.

Mr. Handmaker's business career in Altoona began in 1925 at Beale Avenue and 24th Street. At that time, there were three employees—himself and two others. Today, his vast network of holdings in his Automotive Supply Co. and its divisions employs more than 350 persons.

Those who were close to this successful business leader realize that he shunned publicity for himself. Nevertheless, we feel that any individual who made such wonderful strides in his own endeavors and who had done so much good (with no fanfare), merits a written tribute at his passing.

Just as Phil Handmaker never hesitated to make a decision while he lived, it seemed that he died that way.

We would recount his many fine traits of character:

Devoted to family, extremely proud of grandchildren.

Keen insight, always knew what to do and the right time to do it.

Never forgot humble beginning, always anxious to help the less fortunate or anyone who needed a boost.

Strict attention to business—not one for a lot of frivolity.

Office door always open—constantly being approached by those who needed advice or those who wanted his opinion on business and other matters.

In spite of his growth, he never changed. Those who knew him in 1925 (the oldtimers) marveled that he was the same Phil Handmaker they knew way back when.

Accepted appointment to the bus authority even though he was in an entirely unassociated business. He realized that transportation was a must for the community—nothing selfish in his accepting the appointment as his business was not dependent upon public transportation.

Never blessed with a son—seemed to express his interest in young men by offering summertime employment to a great number of college age young men. One such young man, now a law student, when told of Mr. Handmaker's passing, remarked that he learned more from his association with Phil Handmaker and working for Automotive Supply Co. than he did in his 4 years at college.

The Automotive Supply Co., of which he was president, comprises 16 branch firms in Pennsylvania. The main corporation also includes these divisions: University Supply Co., with branch locations at Morgantown and Kingwood, W. Va.; Complete Auto & Home Supply Co., 11 locations in Arizona; Complete Industrial Supply Co., 2 branch locations in Arizona. He was a director of the Twin City Rapid Transit Co., Minneapolis, Minn. He also served as chairman of the Transportation and Motor Buses for Public Use Authority in Altoona.

The life and work of Philip H. Handmaker will ever stand as a monument to his success. His passing is mourned by all who knew him.

HIS ASSOCIATES.

FLAG OF DEATH FOR EVERYONE

EDITOR OF THE ALTOONA MIRROR:

When the morning of August 9, 1959, began, the news was circulated in Altoona that Phil H. Handmaker was no longer among the living. It is very hard to express sympathy when the wound is new, but every one of us must go through it.

The flag of death is for everyone. The life of a person going through this world is like a person arriving in a city, staying overnight at a hotel and leaving in the morning. Life is divided into three parts.

First, a child is born, and as soon as he opens his eyes to look at the world, he closes his eyes and falls back into eternal sleep. Second, when a person is young, in middle age, he strives for happy ending and golden dreams. Suddenly death enters and ends his dreams. Third, when a person reaches old age, his strength leaves.

Naturally your sorrow is very great, but you must remember that death, the funeral, the grave, the cemetery is not the final end of a person. Because the other world brings a new life. I hope his soul is at rest and peace.

Amending the Bankruptcy Act With Respect to Discrimination Against Salesmen

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, on January 7, 1959, I introduced H.R. 872, to amend the Bankruptcy Act with respect to the priority of debts owed by a bankrupt to workmen, servants, clerks, and salesmen.

On February 18, 1959, I introduced H.R. 4729 on the same subject.

On August 20, 1959, it was my privilege to appear before Sucommittee No. 4 of the House Judiciary Committee in support of these measures.

My testimony was as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ABRAHAM J. MULTER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK, AUGUST 20, 1959

Mr. MULTER. It is the identical subject, but slightly different language.

I am ARBAHAM J. MULTER, Representative of the 13th District of New York.

I have a prepared statement, Mr. Chairman, which I can leave with you.

Mr. FORRESTER. On both bills?

Mr. MULTER. It covers both bills.

Mr. FORRESTER. Let it be made a part of the record.

Mr. MULTER. I have been introducing a bill covering this subject for many years, having in mind that the limitation now in the statute, in the bankruptcy statute, of $600 for each claimant, in the nature of a wage earner or salaried employee, has long since been outmoded.

Originally I put in a bill some years ago with a change, increasing the amount of $600 to a much larger sum. I followed that same procedure when I introduced H.R. 872, on January 7, 1959. And in that bill, I changed the $600 limitation to $1,500.

On February 18, 1959, I introduced H.R. 4729, which has no limitation of amount but sets up a criterion for determining the maximum that can be paid, averaging it as against the last year's earnings.

Now, the original limitation—may I say first that I do not change the period of time of 3 months prior to the bankruptcy. In other words, any earnings that have not been collected prior to 3 months before the bankruptcy are treated the same as claims of general creditors. That is the law today, and I don't seek to change that. I continue the 3-month limitation, so that the priority granted to earnings applies only if earned within 3 months prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition.

Now, it was in 1898 that Congress first put the $300 limitation into the statute. Then that was changed.

In 1926 the Congress doubled it and made it $600. Even when they increased it at that time to $600 they hardly went far enough, because even on that basis, taking the comparative figures, if they considered the increase in cost of living, and the increase in wages, percentagewise, as against the figure that had been on the statute books from 1898 to 1926, if they had increased it realistically at that time they would have increased it instead of to $600 to $2,200.

Now, I am suggesting now that in the wisdom of the committee either you change that amount to $1,500, which is much more realistic than the $600, but still not as far as it should go, or so as to avoid the necessity of coming in each year, or every 2 or 3 years, asking for another change in the statute, set up a formula something like the one that I have set forth in H.R. 4729. Then you don't have to change the limitation from year to year, but as the standard of living goes up, as wages and salaries and commissions go up, you can then take a base period of 1 year prior to bankruptcy, average that out, and whatever the average earnings have been in that prior year limit the priority claim accordingly to 3 months' earnings, but not to exceed what he actually earned during that 3 months prior to bankruptcy. Thus you have a limitation by formula instead of by dollars and cents.

I think that would be the more realistic way of doing it.

At the same time, I can understand how there may be some reaction, "Why should we allow a priority wage earner so much money, $1,500, it is a lot of money." Or possibly if the formula is adopted it may run to $2,000 or $3,000. Well, the fact of the matter is that we ought to determine the amount a man can receive on the basis of his earning capacity.

If I can only earn $100 a week, and the company that is employing me goes into bankruptcy, then I will file a claim, priority claim, for that $100 a week, multiplied by the 12 or 13 weeks in the 3-month period prior to bankruptcy. But, on the other hand, if I happen to be a better employee, or a commissioned salesman, who is doing an awfully good job for my employer, and I am earning $150 or $200 a week, I don't think I ought to be penalized and put on the same plateau of the fellow not doing as good a job as me and not earning as much. The 3-month period is a fair period. If you let each man get what he has earned during that 3-month period we are being just and fair. I can understand if you don't have some kind of a formula, or some kind of a limitation, it would lend itself to fraud. The bankrupt could make a fraudulent arrangement with some friends, whom he put on his payroll, but actually are not earning anything. He could put them on the payroll for $300 or $400 a week, just prior to the bankruptcy, so that they get priority claims that might eat up all of the assets.

My bill does not permit that, because if it is going to be based on my particular formula, then the man must actually have been earning during that year. We take his average of what he has earned and use that as the basis of the limitation of the priority. I think that is a much fairer standard than now in the law.

But, again. I realize the opposition that might develop to having a statute of this kind which does not fix a maximum dollar limitation.

That is, in the main, my presentation, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. I appreciate very much the opportunity you have given me to come in and present the case for this bill. I do hope you will favorably consider one or the other of these two bills.

Mr. FORRESTER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DOWDY], any questions?

Mr. DOWDY. Not at this moment.

Mr. FORRESTER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITENER]?

Mr. WHITENER. Well, you preserve the 3 months' period for priority?

Mr. MULTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITENER. What about this independent contractor provision? Would that include corporate independent contractors?

Mr. MULTER. No; it was not intended to include the corporate contractor. This was intended to include that salesman who is working for four or five companies, because, as you know, the salesman, many times, will take on three or four different lines. Some companies cannot afford to employ a salesman full time. Therefore, the salesman will carry three or four lines. He may carry items that sell that may be divided pricewise, or they may be divided qualitywise. He may carry three or four different lines for small houses.

Mr. WHITENER. Manufacturers' agents?

Mr. MULTER. Yes; when they get into the higher brackets, they call themselves manufacturers' agents. In the lower brackets——

Mr. WHITENER. Or sales engineers?

Mr. MULTER. Yes—and independent contractors. But where the man is not working for a single company, unless we have some language like this, he is not covered by the statute. You just suggest by asking will this include corporations, that it may be necessary to amplify that language so as to apply to individuals.

Mr. DOWDY. I understand these words are in the present law, is that right?

Mr. DRABKIN. "Salesmen, whether or not they are independent contractors," I think is in the act now. As I read these bills, it doesn't change the scope of the persons covered. It just changes the measure.

Mr. MULTER. That was the intent, to change the measure of the priority claim.

Mr. DRABKIN. I think in 1956 the amendment was made which broadened the scope of the people included. But this bill, as I understand it, would not do that.

Mr. MULTER. Yes, you are quite right on that. I had been introducing bills along this line since back in 1948 or 1949, and I overlooked, until this moment, that in 1956 you broadened the language of the statute as to the definition of wage earner.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. MULTER, did you furnish counsel with a list of your witnesses?

Mr. MULTER. No, I did not do that. But I think that he has some requests from interested persons.

(Statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE ABRAHAM J. MULTER, DEMOCRAT OF NEW YORK, BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY IN SUPPORT OF H.R. 4729, AUGUST 20, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity afforded to me to submit to you my views in support of my bill, H.R. 4729, which I introduced on February 18, 1959.

This bill would remove an archaic discrimination against employees and salesmen when settling the debts of a bankrupt. At the present time, several types of debts have priority and must be paid in full out of bankrupt estates before dividends can be paid to the creditors of the bankrupt. A dollar limitation is placed on only one of these debts, the claims for wages of workmen, servants, clerks, and salesmen. The dollar limitation now effective is the result of a 1926 amendment of a limitation derived from the 1898 act.

The present dollar limit on wages having priority as debts of a bankrupt estate is $600 for each claimant; the amount must have been earned within 3 months before the date of the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. Prior to 1926, the limit was $300. When the increase was discussed on the floor of the House, on April 17, 1926, Congressman Michener said:

"Under the present bankruptcy law there is an amount of $300 for wages earned within 3 months immediately preceding the bankruptcy proceedings allowed as a priority claim. In the amendment suggested the amount is raised to $600. I might say * * * the American Federation of Labor appeared before the committee and asked that the limit on the amount be removed entirely and that the time limit be removed * * * if $300 in 1898 was the proper amount of wages earned within 3 months then in 1926, with changed conditions, that $600 was a fair and equitable amount." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 17, 1926, p. 7675.)

The bill which I have introduced and which now is before you does not disturb the time limit of 3 months on earnings which are given priority. It removes the $600 limitation; and provides safeguards to employees and salesmen, and as well to the other claimants against the estate, in determining the amount of wages and earnings. The safeguards are provided in the method of determining the amount earned or receivable in 3 months prior to bankruptcy. The amount is determined on the basis of the average rate of pay during a period of not more than a year before the bankruptcy occurred. Reasonable rates of compensation should be ascertainable from the experience of a year.

When the $600 limitation was inserted in place of the $300 limit in 1926, it was a respectable sum. It was equal, for example, to more than 5½ months average pay of a manufacturing employee. If the limitation were to bear the same relation to manufacturing wages today, it should be at least $2,200.

It seems to me more appropriate to remove the dollar limitation on wages than to try to find one reasonable figure to fit conditions of today, when we know that the course of wages is upward, and any limitation that is appropriate today will be out of date within a year or two.

Removal of the dollar limitation as proposed in my bill probably would increase the wage claims given priority in settling bankrupt estates. In 1958, in 8,449 asset cases concluded in the courts, wages paid to priority creditors were only 2.3 percent of the proceeds realized from the estate. They were only one-sixth as much as taxes, and less than one-tenth as much as administrative fees and expenses. Removal of the $600 limitation would eliminate the distinction made in treating wages and other priority creditors, and make subsequent amendment unnecessary.

If the Congress will not go along with my bill to the extent of eliminating the dollar limitation then the least it should do is increase the amount to a sum that is fair by today's standards.

Thank you.

FURTHER STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE ABRAHAM J. MULTER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. MULTER. May I respond very briefly, Mr. Chairman—I don't want to hold you too long. But I was intrigued by the opposition presented by Mr. Krause on behalf of the boys practicing in the bankruptcy courts. And I think you would be interested to know that originally, one of these bills I introduced some sessions ago, called for $3,500 as the maximum. Then I found that the bankruptcy lawyers were complaining about it. I discussed it with many of them—members of but none of them talking for the association that my friend Mr. Krause said he represented here today. But I discussed it with them, and they said, "Your $3,500 is just too high. Why don't you work out a formula—instead of having an amount?" And so you got H.R. 4729.

First, before I put in H.R. 4729, which is the formula bill, without an amount, they said, "Why don't you put in a bill for a more realistic amount? So I discussed it with them, back and forth.

Mr. FORRESTER. Who are you talking about?

Mr. MULTER. Lawyers practicing in the bankruptcy courts, most of them from New York, some from Washington, some from Baltimore, some from Philadelphia—friends of mine I met at various bar association meetings and during the course of my activities.

So I then put in what I thought was a more realistic amount which is the $1,500. Then came the suggestion, "Why don't you instead of an amount come up with a formula." So H.R. 4729 came up with a formula.

That is why I said to you, Mr. Chairman, that one is not a substitute for the other—because of the divergence of opinion, I want the committee now to decide which is the better way of doing it, because I think—I hope you will agree with me that the amount of $600 needs some change.

Now, instead of taking this man who is earning $2,500 a week, or $2,500 a month, as a salesman, let's take the average. And the last witness gave you the average in his club of $8,000. I think if you take the statistics from the Department of Commerce, you will find that that is approximately the same average throughout the country of salemen's commissions. They earn about $8,000 a year.

Eight thousand dollars a year is approximately $154 a week; $154 a week for a 12-week, 3-month period is $1,848. Look how close I came to that.

Mr. DOWDY. If it is $8,000 a year, 3 months is a quarter of that, which would be $2,000.

Mr. MULTER. You can figure it that way, too. If you take 13 weeks, it would be approximately $2,000. And the one bill only calls for $1,500.

Now, if you do it the other way, on the formula basis, you will, of course, take in some of the fellows in the higher brackets. But let's have this in mind. I thought possible our friend who is himself a salesman would have made the point, and it would not have been necessary for me to make it. But this is the situation. If you look at what actually happens in these industries, and how the salesman works—many of these salesmen will take this representation, whether they are representing one company or several companies—they go out on the road. They will stay on the road for as much as a month. They will be sending in their orders all the time, the factory or employer is accepting the orders, filling them, shipping them, getting the money. He doesn't get back to his home office anywhere from 4 to 6 weeks after he has left. Sometimes they go out and stay out for as many as 3 months, covering the entire country.

They leave New York City or Baltimore and cover the whole country, before they finally return. And he doesn't know what is going on at home. And when his checks stop coming in to him, he is not getting his weekly or monthly remittance, he will start writing back. If he is covering the country for three or four people instead of one, he can't come rushing back home, "Why haven't you give me my check?" He will be writing and telegraphing for money. When he gets back, he finds his company is in bankruptcy.

Isn't it most unjust to that fellow not to give him fair priority on the wages that he has earned?

Now, originally the statute, I think, said only wages, having in mind just wage earners. A long time ago they broadened the language to cover salaries and commissions.

I think it is fair to say that many of these places cannot stay in business, they cannot earn the money to pay the salaries or the wages to those who are producing the goods, if they didn't have salesmen out on the road, sending in the orders and bringing in the orders. And those fellows are as much entitled to protection of priority claims as the man who is working with his hands, because if the man simply produces, and the goods stay in the warehouse, and are not sold, then there is no money with which to pay his wages.

Mr. FORRESTER. He does get the same thing as a man working with his hands, doesn't he?

Mr. MULTER. Today he does, yes, sir.

Mr. WHITENER. Well, may I interject this thought? In the whole presentation here today, haven't you gentlemen overlooked the fact that if this is liberalized as to salesmen, it would also be liberalized as to the man who does work with his hands?

Mr. MULTER. Yes, of course. We are not trying to put them in a better position. We are trying to equalize the position for all of them.

Mr. FORRESTER. You are just trying to get it raised?

Mr. MULTER. Yes—but raise it for all of them.

Now, one other thing as to the technical language that Mr. Krause referred to, and the possibility of a need for an amendment.

I excuse my friend the salesman, who is not a lawyer, for saying probably it needs amendment. But you lawyers, like myself, I think, should say to Mr. Krause, "Now, Mr. Krause, don't take words out of context. You must read the entire section, and the entire clause." It is true you don't get down to the word "bankrupt" until line 6 on page 2. But if you read the whole thing, it is obvious.

We are not going to let the man working for four people average his earnings and come in and file his claim against the bankrupt for $1,000, because that is his average earning, when he only earned $200 for the bankrupt. It is obviously intended to apply only to his average earnings from the particular bankrupt against whom he is filing a priority claim.

If there is any doubt about it at all, just insert on line 6, after the words "payment" "by the bankrupt". And there can be no doubt about it. I don't think it is necessary to put it in.

I think on the question of independent contractors, while it is not tendered by the bill, now that the matter has come to your attention, if you think that needs some further definition, nobody would object to your clarifying it.

Mr. WHITENER. As I understand, this is the present law insofar as it refers to independent contractors, and as the language appears in the present law, and in your proposed amendment, it would relieve the court of even being concerned as to whether the individual is an independent contractor or an employee. And so you get away from this never never land of legal problems.

Mr. FORRESTER. Thank you, Congressman. We are glad to have you.

Labor Fights for Justice

OF

HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, on September 1, my colleague [Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina] had inserted in the RECORD a broad attack on James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, AFL–CIO, which had been published by the Allendale County Citizen, Allendale, S.C., under dateline of August 28, 1959. There was also included correspondence which indicated a personal attack against Mr. Carey, impugning his Americanism.

On the basis of the statement which Mr. RIVERS inserted in the RECORD, it is apparent that my esteemed colleague is unaware of the great contribution Mr. Carey has made in this country. Through Mr. Carey's efforts, thousands, even millions of Americans, have achieved a better life, better pay, better ability to buy the necessities and other good things produced by our country, better working conditions, and the right to hold their heads high in dealings with their employers.

I am sure that Mr. Carey could have chosen to be on the management side with his extraordinary ability, but he elected rather to fight for the rights of the American man and woman who works for a living. It is this dedication to the cause of the workingmen that obviously motivated Mr. Carey's letters to various Congressmen who supported the Landrum-Griffin bill.

There is no question in the minds of many workingmen that the support for the Landrum-Griffin bill was motivated by economic reasons to maintain the competitive edge which cheap labor obtains for several sections of our country. Of course, many supported this bill to clean up the rottenness in labor unions, but no such support developed to clean up the rottenness in management. The Landrum-Griffin bill went far beyond the requirements of protecting the union member and cleaning out the racketeers. That bill disregards the economic effect of the industrial North, East, and West by destroying labor's traditional practices to organize and to obtain a decent wage for the workingman. Many Southern States have no protection for workers in their desire to obtain a decent wage. They do not provide any minimum-wage protection and labor legislation. The Southern States which have no minimum wages are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas. My colleague [Mr. RIVERS] comes from South Carolina, where there is no minimum wage in industries not affected by interstate commerce. Arkansas, whose representative is one of the great fighters for labor reforms, Senator MCCLELLAN, has a minimum wage law, but the minimum is pathetically low and amounts to a minimum of 16 cents per hour; hardly sufficient to keep body and soul together.

Several States have no compulsory compensation laws, and these are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas.

The existence of cheap wages and its component competitive edge has caused industry to flee from the North to various sections of the country where the climate is right for wages which are cheap and the benefits to management are many.

I have taken the trouble to inquire into a number of industries which have fled from my own city of New York to go to Southern States where management can obtain a competitive advantage over States which have high standards of wages and strong unions. These are as follows:

Company name	From	To
Cohler & Campbell	Bronx, N.Y.	Granite Falls, N.C.
American Safety Razor Corp.	Kings, N.Y.	Staunton, Va.
Arkel Safety Bag Co.	do	Newport News, Va.
Bonner Spring Hinge Co.	do	Londuram, S.C.
Julius Kayser, Inc.	do	Greenville, S.C.
Reynolds Metals Co.	Queens, N.Y.	Alabama.

These firms which employed 100 or more employees left the city of New York thereby creating unemployment in my city and brought material benefits to States which attracted their operation. Is it any wonder that Mr. Carey who has been struggling to obtain decent wages for the working man and who has contributed so much to the labor forces would resent legislators who by their vote tend to destroy the ability of labor to defend itself?

I do not condone threats nor do I appreciate personal attacks upon people for their opposition. America has been great because we can disagree without being disagreeable. We have freedom of speech and we have the inalienable right to criticize representatives. In fairness to Mr. Carey, who represents a large segment of decent and honest labor forces, I set forth Mr. Carey's record for all to see so that the distorted impression obtained by a reading of Mr. RIVER's statement would not be accepted by all fair thinking people.

Leadership and Progress: The Test of Our Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARROLL D. KEARNS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 1, 1959

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address by the Honorable Arthur E. Summerfield on the occasion of the oil industry centennial, Titusville, Pa., August 27, 1959:

LEADERSHIP AND PROGRESS: THE TEST OF OUR TIME

(Address by the Honorable Arthur E. Summerfield, Postmaster General of the United States, on occasion of the oil industry centennial, Titusville, Pa., August 27, 1959)

Any man in these United States would be honored to be asked to speak here today.

I think, however, he would realize quickly that this is more than an honor. It is also a very formidable challenge.

Here, within this room, is as great gathering of distinguished minds as you could find any place, at any time, for any occasion.

Here is the leadership that has built the modern American petroleum industry. And the accomplishments of this industry are so fabulous as to be almost incredible.

From this industry comes the very lifepower behind the growth and progress and security of not only America, but the free world.

We thrive as a free and dynamic people because this industry, in the face of immense problems, is able to provide abundant, low-cost energy for our tremendous needs.

We are gratefully mindful that our country, with 7 percent of the world's population, produces some 40 percent of the energy used by the entire human race.

It is generally forecast that, in our country alone, energy requirements by 1975 will increase by 94 percent. And we have complete confidence that this industry will supply most of this increase—because you who lead it have shown that no challenge is too great for you to accept and meet.

In such presence, the wise speaker will adhere to a subject with which he is most familiar.

I feel I can do this best by reporting to you on some specific problems we face in Washington today. Since any problems in Washington are in fact the direct concern of every citizen—and especially those of you in capacities of leadership—I believe my purpose is appropriate to this occasion.

Further, I should like to do more than report. I should like to tell you what I believe to be the most crucial problem confronting us. And I would then dare to ask you to assess what you can do to help in its solution.

Let me approach the definition of this problem by making two observations that are well known to you:

The first is that government policy vitally affects the economy of any nation. In a dictator state, of course, the effect is absolute. But even in a republic with a free enterprise system, the government literally determines the broad conditions under which the economy shall operate.

The second point is that, in a republic, the elected representatives of the people presumably are to provide the kind of government the majority of the people want.

It is therefore to be assumed that the people have the right—if not the obligation—to insist upon getting the policies they want.

One natural consequence of this process is the formation of pressure groups—groups that may represent only a small fraction of the electorate, but that organize their efforts, vocally and actively, to advance their own self-interest.

When their interest represents the needs and desires of the great majority of the people, they deserve support.

When their interest is detrimental to the people, they deserve defeat. But the fact is, they may still succeed—and all too often, do. They succeed because the interests of the people have too few champions—too few men and women with the talents and the willingness to speak up, to lead the fight in the people's behalf.

To the public officeholder, the self-interest groups appear to have the initiative; the public appears to be apathetic.

If I may be allowed a personal reference, I would mention that I first became aware of these simple facts back in 1940, when I was a businessman very much absorbed in my own business.

There occurred in my home town a shocking demonstration of the worst kind of pressure-group tactics. No one in public office seemed to be willing to cope with it. I began to envision what would happen if such pressure groups, across the land, should come to dominate our local and State, and even our Federal, governments.

And it became clear to me that I had a responsibility beyond the voting booth—that I should try, in any event, to contribute as I could to the kind of sound government that would make pressure-group government impossible.

My interest, it seems, proved to be more than a passing fancy. I am exceedingly happy that it did. I have cherished my participation in politics and public service. Nothing in my life has been quite so spiritually rewarding, so satisfying.

The basic issue which moved me in 1940 has expanded many times over, today. It is the main force to be reckoned with, as we make our decisions on national economic policy. This year, and in the years directly ahead, these decisions will be crucial.

Upon them will rest the future of our whole security, and freedom and progress as a Nation.

For these are times of supreme challenge. We are engaged in a mammoth cold war in which no quarter is given. It is a war involving economic, as well as physical and moral, strength.

In all the writings of Karl Marx, there is not a line which advocates the overthrow of capitalism by force. Instead, the entire creed is that capitalistic nations will fall because their currencies will weaken and their economies fail.

Certain it is that economic folly, on our part, would be an invitation to disaster. A sound and growing economy is utterly essential to victory.

So our fundamental decision comes down to this: Whether we are to have economic folly through government by pressure group, with inflation, higher taxation, and deadly monopoly power; or, whether we are to have sound government, with sound economic policies that rid us of inflation, confiscatory taxation, and abuses of monopoly power.

At present, our Nation has reached the highest level of prosperity in our history. We have the healthiest, strongest economy America has yet known.

Our people are enjoying higher wages and better living standards than ever before.

Overall output is at record levels, and rising steadily.

Employment is rising steeply. Unemployment is falling sharply.

For more than a year, the cost of living has remained generally stable.

The battle for a sound dollar is at least temporarily won.

And the outlook for a balanced budget is the brightest it has been in a great many months.

These are achievements made possible by sound policies of government—policies maintained by a determined Federal administration.

They are the result of a resolute battle to bring a rampant inflationary momentum under control.

They are the product of clear-thinking, farsighted leadership—the kind provided by the President in the 1958 recession, when he guided with a steady hand and refused to rush into panic spending.

All these are hard-won gains. And, my friends, it will be harder still to hold them and to continue advancing along these sound ways.

The battle against economic folly is only begun. It must be waged persistently and firmly, as long as there are forces seeking to resume the inflationary process.

The pressure for extravagant Government spending remains very much in being. The groups behind them never rest. Washington is swarming with their representatives, wielding every political weapon that can be applied.

Many in the Congress are inherently bent on limitless spending and taxation. They will ignore the consequences of cheap dollars and deficit financing.

Almost all of these particular Members are saying—for public consumption—that they are opposed to inflation. But what happens every time they have the opportunity to act?

They fight and vote for budget-busting bills that would give inflation another boost.

We have seen examples in just the past few weeks. We are seeing examples now.

I hope you have read the first reports from our Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth. I hope, in fact, that all thinking Americans have read them.

I can tell you they represent a tremendous amount of careful study and work. They look at the problems squarely, and they call a spade a spade.

Few men of responsible position, in either political party, in Washington or elsewhere, have sought to quarrel with the findings or conclusions. I believe that even those who would like to discredit them recognize that their strength lies in their truth.

The reports face up to the fact that new inflation can also come from sharp new spirals in wages and prices.

The challenge to the American people is to demand real statesmanship from all concerned—all who influence the factors that bear on prices, and thus the cost of living.

Union members, with most other Americans, want their leaders, as well as the leaders in management, to exercise basic economic commonsense. They have said so in many surveys of their views.

They do not want an ever-rising cost of living forced upon the country by wage increases that outrun increases in productivity.

They do not want inflation. They want fairness with a future.

They—and all our citizens—must realize, too, the important place that taxation holds in that future.

Our population is growing rapidly. Business can create new jobs to meet this growth only as billions of dollars are invested in new tools and capacity.

From where is this money to come, if Federal, State, and local taxes eat up business income?

There are over 100,000 taxing authorities in our country. Their weight can literally crush the ability of business to meet its job-creating capital needs.

As you so well know, our present tax structure is seriously outdated. It is a set of laws reflecting largely the conditions of the past, especially World War II, when the goal was the confiscation of war profits, not the building of a sound peacetime economy.

A dynamic program of tax reform and reduction is needed in its place. Such a program can ease the burden our taxes are placing on the accumulation of capital for investment.

It can relieve the stifling taxload being carried by the individual citizen, and by our business system.

The Revenue Act of 1954 was a major step in this direction, bringing the greatest dollar reduction in Federal taxes in our history.

Today, the President's insistence on a balanced budget is essential to this goal.

And, needless to say, the broad support of the people will be necessary if this program eventually is to be accomplished.

Let me repeat: The forces devoted to irresponsible spending and taxation are strongly organized. They are highly vocal. They are grimly persistent. They remain confident.

As opposed to them, the number leading the fight for sound government has been relatively small. In Washington, this fight has been led, in large part, by the President and the Vice President, sustained by key members of the administration and some stalwart Members of the Congress.

These are the men who have battled for fiscal sanity, for a balanced budget, for steps leading to tax reform and reduction. More—many more—are needed in every State in the Union.

And here I submit, gentlemen, is the most crucial problem facing this country. It is the need for all who believe in sound government to stand forth and support the efforts that must be made to maintain it.

It is the need for men who have talents of leadership to apply these talents to the political life of the nation.

I would suggest that too much is being expected of too few. The majority of our people want sound and responsible progress by all segments of our society. There has been a vast increase in public consciousness of the fact that only the people, in the end, can see to it that this kind of progress is maintained.

No more dramatic example could be given than the way in which the people have made it clear that they want the abuses of labor monopoly power stopped. Their mandate has been so strong that the adoption of a vitally needed labor reform law—which the labor monopoly leaders appeared to have blocked as little as 3 months ago—is nearly a reality.

We have seen, too, how the forward march of inflation has been slowed by an aroused public opinion. In no other way could the inflationary forces that ran rampant for so many years have been brought to a halt.

But we must not be misled. Let public vigilance fall away only a little, and the pressure groups will be in the ascendence again. The spenders and taxers will not yield easily, nor will those determined to exploit labor monopoly power.

To keep the public interest uppermost, the people will need articulate help and leadership in every community; not advice from the sidelines; nor cautious detachment from the arena where the decisions are being made.

I know of no men in America life whose leadership could be more important than the men in this room at this moment.

No one could speak with greater authority, for you have shown how successfully you can deal with the very problems that confront us.

This great industry has been outstanding in fighting inflation by holding down prices. In the 10 years from 1949 to 1958, gasoline prices, exclusive of taxes, increased less than 6 percent on a national average, while the cost of living rose more than 20 percent. And these were prices for gasoline constantly improved in quality through huge expenditures in research and development.

Your experience in this industry, too, equips you to emphasize the necessity of vast expenditures by private industry for technology and facilities to meet public needs.

The oil industry knows only too well that, if its capital is taxed away, it cannot continue to make the enormous investments, and take the risks, that have enabled it to serve the public so well to this time.

You know, at first hand, such inflationary pressures as that behind the highway construction program. You know that we must be extremely careful that our Federal highway program is carried forward on the most efficient basis possible.

Already, we find, the estimated costs of this program are running 45 percent higher than in 1956, when it was first approved in Congress.

Our people must be urged to see that this program does not become immersed in a pork barrel. Its potential as an element of inflation is great and serious.

I know very well, indeed, how easy it is to become engrossed in the problems and duties of daily business. I know how difficult it is to find the time for other activity.

But it can be done. In time of war, all of us are ready to change our lives, to go where we are needed, to serve in the best way we can. We are willing to make any sacrifice to preserve the life and future of our Nation.

We are engaged in no shooting war, but my friends, we are engaged in a battle to preserve the life and the bright future of our country.

It is a time for service, for sacrifice, for leadership.

There is in this room, a tremendous reservoir of vital political thinking, and of great ability to communicate this thinking.

This, too, is demonstrated on the record. I have been told that at least 10 major oil companies have launched public affairs programs to make their employees better informed citizens—and to encourage employees to participate, as citizens, in political activity.

I know personally that many of you are giving increasingly of your time and ability, as citizens, to public affairs and political participation. This, of course, is of first importance. If a public affairs program for employees is to succeed, it must certainly have the demonstrated leadership of the management of the enterprise.

I would appeal to you, in all events, to speak, work and fight for sound policies and a stronger America.

I would ask you to assess anew the importance of your political participation.

The political party of our choice is, and will be, what we make of it—either by participation, or lack of participation, in its affairs and its choice of candidates.

Unless more responsible citizens devote real time and effort to unselfish politics, government by pressure groups will triumph.

Only by genuine participation can we be sure that the Government will serve all the people—not some special interest—and assure that the government will serve all the citizens.

This is a day of great meaning in our Nation's history. All America is proud and grateful on this anniversary of these first magnificent 100 years.

It is a day of even greater meaning to our Nation's future. We know that untold wonders will come in the years ahead, in the second century of oil progress.

We salute you—we look to your leadership in industry, and in our national life.

In the spirit of your accomplishment, we shall move forward into the golden era of opportunity that lies before us.

We shall prove anew there is no conceivable limit to the advance of a free people—no goal they cannot, with wisdom and courage, attain.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1959

(Legislative day of Monday, August 31, 1959)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Father of all men, in a day of tribulation, when the very foundations of human society seem to be resting on sinking sand, Thou hast called us to dedicate our brief and little lives to vast and vital causes.

In the midst of world conditions that baffle us, of swift social currents which sweep away our strongest bulwarks, and of evil forces whose hideous cruelty stabs our anguished hearts, we confess that the world in which our lot is cast is too much for us.

Forgive us that it has taken the dreadful threat of a global war for us to recognize that all peoples must work out the common concerns of humanity together, or else go down together into the flaming burial of a final suicidal holocaust.

Because there is no solution of the world's ills, save as it springs from Thy sovereignty and from the hearts of men, we pray, for ourselves, create in us clean hearts, O God, and renew right spirits within us, that we may contribute worthily to mankind's abiding peace.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, September 1, 1959, was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILL PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The bill (H.R. 8728) to amend the Federal Boating Act of 1958 to extend for an additional year the period when certain provisions of that act will take effect, received from the House of Representatives on September 1, 1959, was read twice by its title and placed on the calendar.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the Insurance Subcommittee of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Finance Committee were authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate entered an order that today there would be the usual morning hour for the transaction of purely routine business, with statements limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct; and morning business is in order.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT OF U.S. SOLDIERS' HOME

A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the U.S. Soldiers' Home, for the fiscal year 1958, and a copy of the report of the annual inspection of the home, 1958, by the Inspector General of the Army (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

A letter from the chairman, Subcommittee on Canadian Affairs, of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the second meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, held in Montreal and Ottawa, Canada, on June 25–28, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 203(j) OF FEDERAL PROPERTY AND ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES ACT OF 1949

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend section 203(j) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 484(j)), to provide that the Department of Defense may allocate surplus property under its control for transfer under that act only to educational institutions conducting approved military programs (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Government Operations.

AUDIT REPORT ON ACCOUNTS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army, fiscal year 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN RETIREMENT PROMOTION AUTHORITY OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal certain retirement promotion authority of the Coast and Geodetic Survey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORT ON TORT CLAIMS PAID BY VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Deputy Administrator, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on tort claims paid by that Administration, during fiscal year ended June 30, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON TORT CLAIMS PAID BY FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY

A letter from the Administrator, Federal Aviation Agency, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on tort claims paid by that Agency, during the fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Two letters from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders suspending deportation of certain aliens, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law pertaining to each alien, and the reasons for ordering such suspension (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATUS OF PERMANENT RESIDENCE FOR CERTAIN ALIENS

A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of orders granting the applications for permanent residence filed by certain aliens, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law as to each alien, and the reasons for granting such applications (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A telegram from the chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Santa Clara County, Calif., embodying a resolution adopted by that board, favoring the enactment of legislation to continue and complete the San Francisco Bay study, and flood control and reclamation projects; ordered to lie on the table.

A resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Pueblo, Colo., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide home rule in the District of Columbia; ordered to lie on the table.

SMALL WATERSHED PROGRAM IN KANSAS—RESOLUTION

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Farmers Union Jobbing Association in its meeting at Kansas City on August 18 adopted a resolution in regard to the small watershed program for the control of water runoff.

There is much interest in the small watershed program in Kansas and there are some very fine projects under construction.

Many other watersheds are being studied at the present time with a view of establishing watershed drainage areas.

This is a program that needs to be expanded greatly in our State and I request that this resolution be made a part of these remarks and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the directors of the Farmers Union Jobbing Association, in meeting in Kansas City, Mo. this August 18, 1959, That it continue to favor the use of the small watershed method of flood control rather than the construction of large dams in the main streams. Further, we are especially concerned and opposed to the construction of the eight proposed dams on the tributaries of the Kaw River, which are in the area served this association; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Senators SCHOEPPEL and CARLSON, Congressmen REES and AVERY, the Abilene Reflector Chronicle and such other newspapers of the involved area.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, without amendment:

By Mr. MAGNUSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with amendments:

S. 2598. A bill to amend the Federal Boating Act of 1958 to extend until January 1, 1961, the period when certain provisions of that act will take effect (Rept. No. 875).

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, without amendment:

H.R. 4857. An act to amend section 4233 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the exemptions from the admissions tax for athletic games benefiting crippled or retarded children shall apply where the participants have recently attended designated schools or colleges as well as where they are currently students (Rept. No. 877); and

H.R. 8725. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make technical changes in certain excise tax laws, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 878).

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia (by request):

S. 2630. A bill to provide for a parkway connection between Mount Vernon and Woodlawn Plantations, in the State of Virginia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. WILEY:

S. 2631. A bill for the relief of Dr. Gernot Rath; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey (for himself, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. FREAR, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware):

S. 2632. A bill to assist the States of New Jersey and Delaware in developing a strain of oysters resistant to causes which threaten the oyster industry on the east coast; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia:

S.J. Res. 137. Joint resolution to authorize the James Monroe Memorial Foundation to erect a memorial on public grounds in the District of Columbia to honor James Monroe, fifth President of the United States; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

FILING OF APPLICATIONS FOR MOVING COSTS RESULTING FROM CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS—AMENDMENT

Mr. BIBLE submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 4656) to amend section 401b of the act of July 14, 1952, to permit applications for moving costs resulting from any public works project of a military department to be filed either 1 year from the date of acquisition or 1 year following the date of vacating the property, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938—AMENDMENT

Mr. ANDERSON submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 4874) to amend section 334 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to provide that for certain purposes of this section, farms on which the farm marketing excess of wheat is adjusted to zero because of underproduction shall be regarded as farms on which the entire amount of the farm marketing excess of wheat has been delivered to the Secretary or stored to avoid or postpone the payment of the penalty, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. ENGLE:

Citation presented to Senator SYMINGTON by the national convention of AMVETS, at Grand Rapids, Mich., on August 22, 1959; and address delivered by Senator SYMINGTON before that convention.

By Mr. MONRONEY:

Address delivered by Senator BARTLETT before the Association of Local Transport Airlines, at Anchorage, Alaska, on July 29, 1959.

Article entitled "Oklahoma," published in the Lykes Fleet Flashes magazine, New Orleans, La.

By Mr. BARTLETT:

Statement by him relating to the golden dollar sent to each Member of Congress, supplied by the Fairbanks, Alaska, Chamber of Commerce.

By Mr. WILEY:

Remarks by him on the diversion of water issue.

TELEVISION SHOW "CELEBRITY" WITH JOE McCAFFREY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, for more than 4 years I have been a part of the audience which has enjoyed and has been enlightened by Joe McCaffrey's television show, "Celebrity Parade." It is, in my opinion, one of the finest examples of how the medium of television can be used both to entertain and to inform.

The show was sponsored by the Retail Clerks International Association. It is a tribute to the good sense and the public spiritedness of that union and its outstanding president, James Suffridge, that Joe McCaffrey was chosen to officiate over "Celebrity Parade," and was given a free hand to run it impartially, objectively, and in very good taste.

So fairly did Joe McCaffrey perform his functions, that in recent weeks both the chairman of the Democratic Party and the chairman of the Republican Party appeared on "Celebrity Parade."

During the years it has been on the airways, moreover, the program has featured, among its 450 guests, 44 members of the present Senate, Ambassadors, authors, outstanding correspondents, and a cross section of rank-and-file citizens. It has focused public attention not only on great political issues, but also on some of the serious social problems which affect the Nation, such as mental health, education, and marital discord. The program has also done yeoman's work for worthy private organizations, such as the Salvation Army, the Heart Association, and the Tuberculosis Association.

I regret, Mr. President, that during the past few years Joe McCaffrey's "Celebrity Parade" has been televised only in the Washington area. This limited range denied to the rest of the Nation, the many hours of pleasure and information which the program has provided.

I regret even more, Mr. President, that "Celebrity Parade" is now leaving the air, even in the Washington area. I trust that the departure will be but a prelude to greater public service for Joe McCaffrey. He is, in my opinion, one of the Nation's finest and most impartial men in the news and public-service fields. With the airways already putting forth a surfeit of bombastic, biased newscasts and vast numbers of cops-and-robbers and cowboys-and-Indians and assorted violence and nonsense of other kinds of programs, all encased and striated with commercials which often are insulting to the intelligence of 6 year olds, we can ill-afford not to use, to the fullest, the talents of a Joe McCaffrey or to lose programs of the caliber of "Celebrity Parade."

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY AND YOUTH CRIME IN NEW YORK CITY

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, New York is being troubled with an outbreak of teenage crime and teenage gang violence which is of a most extraordinary character—so much so as to require emergency action by the Governor of the State and the mayor of the city of New York. Four young people have been killed in this outbreak, and the police network has drawn in a great many suspects. This situation naturally gives a community very grave cause for concern and introspection of a most serious character into its own situation.

This outbreak of juvenile delinquency and youth crime is not unique to New York; it is a national phenomenon. Indeed, it is an international phenomenon—from what we hear—with its presence evident even in the Soviet Union, notwithstanding the Communists' bombast about the "paradise" in which they live.

Mr. President, today the New York Times has analyzed the situation in various cities, including Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, Cleveland, and San Francisco, where curfew laws are in force to keep children off the streets.

Personally, I do not like curfew laws; I do not think any person who is deeply interested in civil liberties likes them. Nevertheless, the situation is so severe that perhaps even this extreme measure of very doubtful constitutionality should at least be considered by the authorities. Perhaps some adaptation of it might work. Also, we have grave problems of intergroup relationships and interracial relations on which we must work in the tradition of the dedication of New York's government, city and State, and the great majority of its people that equal opportunity and equality of status before the law are precious and inviolable to us.

Mr. President, the point of my remarks this morning, however, aside from calling the attention of the Senate to this very serious situation, is the fact that we have on the calendar a juvenile delinquency bill, the Juvenile Delinquency Act of 1959, Calendar No. 819, Senate bill 694, which was reported out of my own Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

This bill—although modest in scope, for it deals very largely with only experimental techniques for handling juvenile delinquency and youth crime—at the very least will put the National Government's prestige and the national governmental organization, both in the educational field and in the other fields in which the National Government operates, behind the efforts of the cities and the States to deal with juvenile delinquency and youth crime.

I believe this to be a most urgent matter among our problems at home. We have found, and I, myself, found this when I was attorney general of New York, and was a member of the New York State Commission on Youth and Delinquency—a commission, which I helped start, headed by Tom Watson, Jr.—that the old ideas to the effect that juvenile delinquency and youth crime were attributable mainly to slums and perhaps even to under par economic status were not entirely valid. For example we found that broken homes and the rootlessness and frustration of youth in the atomic age are among the principal causes of youth crimes; and that new techniques, through which the State substitutes for the broken homes and the rootlessness, by means of the services it offers, are extremely effective in this field. In this connection, the Governor of our State has called for cooperative action by churches, synagogues, temples, civic and veterans' organizations, and voluntary groups of all kinds. This is very important.

So, Mr. President, in highlighting this serious situation which we in New York face, and which is but a demonstration of what is occurring in the rest of the country and in the world, I urge that the Senate act on the measure known as the Juvenile Delinquency Act of 1959.

I point out that the ability to cope with this problem at the moment is being outstripped at an alarming rate by the increase in the problem itself.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a part of my remarks my own concurrent views in the report on this question, which detail a great many figures to demonstrate that fact, and also the analysis from the New York Times on the operations of a curfew.

I conclude by urging upon our leadership action—I hope action today—on the bill known as the Juvenile Delinquency Act of 1959, which can be called up at any time.

There being no objection, the views and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS OF SENATOR JAVITS

The committee bill as it is now constituted provides for the highly important basis of experiment projects from which our most intelligent and effective efforts to cope with and to prevent the increasingly rapid spread of juvenile delinquency are likely to emanate. Most importantly it enables the Federal Government to help in the national juvenile delinquency emergency—and this is the major contribution of the bill. Where it falls short is in the failure to give aid on a sharing basis to State, municipal and voluntary efforts to prevent and cure juvenile delinquency, nor does it help with the training of needed personnel. My bill, the Juvenile Delinquency Control Act (S. 1341), covers these matters. They are so essential to a Federal juvenile delinquency program and the juvenile delinquency emergency is so great that the committee's bill can only be considered a first step on the part of the Federal Government.

The committee bill makes no provision to follow through on efforts to study juvenile delinquency. Even if we learn more and more about the causes of juvenile delinquency and develop methods to prevent and deal with it, we will still need a growing number of trained personnel to make use of this knowledge and these methods and we need to encourage the setting up of definitive means to put the methods into practice on a large enough scale.

I have been impressed by the importance which many of the most distinguished and experienced witnesses attached to the need for increasing the woefully inadequate force of people trained to deal with the problems of our youth: trained social workers, police officers, parents, judges and psychiatrists and psychologists. An analysis of these personnel shortages can be found on pages 149 to 151 of the hearings. Independent inquiry has confirmed these findings. There are an estimated 100,000 people in the United States trying to cope with mounting problems of juvenile delinquency but only a very small part of them can be said to have adequate training for their task; for instance, of the 50,000 police so engaged only 5,000 to 10,000 are specifically trained. It was furthermore noted in the hearings that whereas juvenile delinquency rose by 82 percent between 1952 and 1957, the number of probation officers for delinquents increased by only 46 percent.

I am convinced that our ability to cope with this problem is being outstripped at an increasing and alarming rate by the problem itself. Between 1948 and 1957 the number of juvenile court cases increased at nearly five times the rate at which the 10- to 17-year-old population increased. Between 1957 and 1965 this age group will have increased by another 35 percent. Does this mean that juvenile court cases, now 600,000 per year, will rise by 175 percent and that our court facilities will be swamped by 1,650,000 cases, involving perhaps 1,300,000 or 1 out of 25 of our youngsters? By 1970 there will be a further 10 percent increase in this population. Will our system of youth courts then break down under 2½ million cases involving 1 out of every 20 Americans in this age group?

The trend in arrests is even more alarming. Between 1948 and 1957 arrests of persons under 18 years of age multiplied eight times. Many of these youngsters are dealt with by the police several times a year and, therefore, the number of cases exceeds the number of youth in trouble annually, but this is far from comforting to the thinking person. For, although it makes the problem somewhat less widespread than would appear at first glance, it also indicates that it is much more deeply rooted. If a great number of young people get into trouble once and take the warning and then adhere to the ground rules of civilized society, we can take comfort in the thought of the occasional heedlessness and continual exuberance of youth. However, when a smaller but frighteningly large and increasing number of youngsters habitually commit acts which require attention from the police and when their repeated encounters with the law teach them nothing of right or wrong or of the requirements of social behavior—it is then that we must take alarm.

The problem of juvenile delinquency is on the increase. It does not involve the young man who "borrows" the neighbor's car to go for a spin or the young girl who gets into trouble in some big city. These youngsters can often be handled by religious advisers, teachers, and understanding parents. Usually they won't get into trouble again. But, of the hundreds of thousands of others who appear before juvenile courts for auto theft, larceny, burglary, assault, possession of drugs, drunkenness, vagrancy and even homicide—their problems require the concentrated attention of men and women specificaly trained to cope with them. The children appearing before juvenile courts generally have deepseated problems of delinquency. The fact that many of them appear in court repeatedly and that many of those sent to institutions are returnees, indicates that there is a failure in their treatment. A large part of the failure resides in the shortage of trained personnel. The gap is widening and it is self-perpetuating. We must make a large-scale attempt to put enough people in the field so that at least the number of repeaters can be cut down.

It should also be remembered that usually the longer a youngster engages in crime the more difficult is his rehabilitation. Thus, the problem is growing in two dimensions in breadth and depth.

Juvenile delinquency is a social disease. It is contagious and therefore it threatens the fabric of society. It is also deeply personal, and our respect for the individual human life makes it imperative that we provide the means by which the individual can be helped. There is no drug which will cure this disease—only trained people to help young people to understand the effect of our society and of our laws upon them—and their opportunities under them—can really help.

Let me also point out that in human problems the best research is done by those in the field and the most accurate conclusions are drawn by enlisting the widest experience. Therefore, personnel trained to combat juvenile delinquency will not only be of immediate and tangible help but will also contribute much to the growing and changing body of knowledge we must build.

In conclusion, I would like to deny the validity of the approach which attributes the disturbing statistics merely to greater awareness of the problem or to the traditional conservatism of the adult who takes too serious a view of youthful behavior. The causes of juvenile delinquency are deeply rooted in the uncertainties, injustices, and even in the range of opportunities afforded by the wealth and technology of our modern time. In countries and societies which vary from ours to a greater or lesser degree, the growing instability of youth is noted: in Great Britain, in Sweden, in the Soviet Union, in West Germany.

Both crime among the children of the privileged and crime among the children of the slums have multiplied rapidly. There is no cure-all. Neither permissiveness nor punishment, neither church nor school, nor psychiatrist, neither parent nor policeman, neither judge nor jailer can provide the whole answer. Only all of these things, and many others, widely applied, can help us toward a solution. Therefore, our efforts to prevent and combat juvenile delinquency must be more broad gaged and more practical than what we here propose in this bill.

A bill to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Represenentatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Findings and policies

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that juvenile delinquency diminishes the strength and vitality of the people of our Nation; that such delinquency is increasing in both urban and rural communities; and that its prevention, control, and treatment require intensive efforts on the part of private and governmental interests.

(b) The policy of the Federal Government shall be to assist in the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

TITLE I—DEMONSTRATION AND STUDY PROJECTS

SEC. 101. (a) For the purpose of demonstrating and developing improved methods, including methods for the training of personnel, for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the four succeeding fiscal years such sum, not to exceed $5,000,000, as the Congress may determine.

(b) The sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants or contracts to carry out projects for demonstrations and studies which, in the judgment of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the discovery, the development, or the evaluation or demonstration of the effectiveness, of techniques and practices, including techniques and practices for the training of personnel, for the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. The Secretary may make such grants to States and municipalities and to other public and private nonprofit agencies, including institutions of higher learning or research: Provided, That the Secretary shall require each grant recipient to contribute money, facilities, or services to the extent the Secretary deems appropriate. He may enter into contracts for such projects with public or private organizations or agencies or with any individuals.

(c) Payments under this title may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement as may be determined by the Secretary, and shall be made on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

TITLE II—TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE SERVICES

SEC. 201. (a) The Secretary shall make studies, investigations, and reports with respect to matters relating to the prevention, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, including the effectiveness of programs carried out under this Act, cooperate with and render technical assistance to States and municipalities and other public and private agencies in such matters, and provide short-term training and instruction in technical matters relating to juvenile delinquency.

(b) The Secretary shall, in connection with all grants and contracts provided for in title I, collect, evaluate, publish, and disseminate information and materials for agencies and personnel engaged in programs concerning juvenile delinquency.

TITLE III—NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

SEC. 301. (a) There is hereby established in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a National Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"). The Council shall be composed of the Secretary or his designee, who shall be Chairman, and twelve members appointed without regard to the civil service laws by the Secretary. The appointed members of the Council shall be persons (including persons from public and voluntary organizations) who are recognized authorities in professional or technical fields related to juvenile delinquency or persons representative of the general public who are leaders in programs concerned with juvenile delinquency. The Council shall advise the Secretary on the administration of this Act.

(b) Before any grant or contract is made under title I, the Council shall review the project involved and shall submit its recommendation thereon to the Secretary. The Council may also recommend to the Secretary projects initiated by it. The Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of any member or members of the Council in connection with matters relating to this Act for such periods, in addition to conference periods, as he may determine.

(c) Appointed members of the Council, while attending meetings of the Council or otherwise serving at the request of the Secretary, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary, but not exceeding $50 per diem, including travel time, and while away from their homes or regular places of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 73b–2) for persons in the Government service employed intermittently. Notwithstanding the foregoing or any other provision of law, the Secretary may accept the services of appointed members under this section without the payment of compensation therefor (and with or without payment of travel expenses or per diem in lieu of subsistence).

(d) (1) Any member of the Council is hereby exempted, with respect to such appointment, from the operation of sections 381, 283, 284, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U.S.C. 99), except as otherwise specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection.

(2) The exemption granted by paragraph (1) shall not extend—

(A) to the receipt of payment of salary in connection with the appointee's Government service from any source other than the private employer of the appointee at the time of his appointment; or

(B) during the period of such appointment, and the further period of two years after the termination thereof, to the prosecution or participation in the prosecution, by any person so appointed, of any claim against the Government involving any matter concerning which the appointee had any responsibility arising out of his appointment during the period of such appointment.

TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. (a) The Secretary is authorized to make regulations governing the administration of this Act.

(b) The Secretary shall include in his annual report a full report of the administration of this Act.

(c) There are hereby authorized to be included for each fiscal year in the appropriation for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare such sums as are necessary to administer this Act.

(d) The term "State" in this Act includes the District of Columbia, Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and Guam.

CURFEWS ON TEENAGERS APPLAUDED BY POLICE IN SIX U.S. CITIES—STREET BAN FOUND AID IN CRIME FIGHT—IT IS NOT PANACEA, HOWEVER, OFFICIALS NOTE—PROPOSAL BEING CONSIDERED HERE

(By Seymour Topping)

A survey of six large cities in the United States shows that a curfew for teenagers can be useful in combating juvenile delinquency, but that it falls far short of being a cure-all for violence and crime.

City officials here debated yesterday the wisdom of imposing a curfew after the recent gang killings of four Manhattan teenagers.

Police Commissioner Stephen P. Kennedy opposed the curfew proposal as unfair "to the 97 percent of our children who are law abiding." The commissioner expressed doubt that a curfew would be effective and said it should be a parental responsibility in any case.

Mr. Kennedy is believed to have reflected the views of Mayor Wagner who was instrumental in killing a curfew law introduced into the city council in 1954.

Councilman J. Daniel Diggs of Brooklyn announced Monday that he would introduce a proposal to require the city to enforce a 10 p.m. street curfew on teenagers.

In the cities of Philadelphia, Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, Cleveland, and San Francisco laws are in force that keep children under the age of 17 off the streets after certain hours. At least a dozen other big cities have similar ordinances, as do many smaller communities.

CURFEW CALLED ENFORCEABLE

Police spokesmen in the six cities surveyed agreed that their curfew laws were enforcible and worth while. They stressed, however, that it was only one of many aids utilized against juvenile delinquency.

Philadelphia has a typical comprehensive ordinance that has been in effect since February 1, 1955.

Children under the age of 17, must be off the streets before 10:30 p.m. unless accompanied by a responsible adult. The law applies Sunday through Thursday and, the time limit is midnight on Friday and Saturday. In the recent New York killings, the assailants involved were mostly 17 or 18 years of age, while their victims were 16 or younger.

The Philadelphia curfew allows exceptions when a child is en route home from regular employment or has been sent by a parent on some urgent errand such as for medicine.

When a patrolman arrests a violator, a warning is sent to the parent or guardian. A second violation puts the child and responsible adult before a magistrate's court, which sits once a month and tries an average of 50 cases in an evening.

A parent can be fined $5 to $100 plus court costs. The manager or proprietor of any public establishment that allows youths to loiter there after curfew can be fined $25 to $300.

Inspector Harry Fox, head of the juvenile division, said there were 10,044 violations last year in Philadelphia, a city of 2 million. Mr. Fox said juvenile crime was down 9 percent last year and had fallen 4 percent in 1957.

In explaining the value of a curfew Lt. John Hagermoser of Detroit's Youth Board said: "It costs negligent parents money and so they become more alert to what their children are doing."

"It helps by making a youngster more apprehensive and less apt to stay out late and get into trouble," Sgt. James Stokes of the Chicago police Youth Board, said.

Capt. Adolph C. Jacobsmeyer of the juvenile division of the St. Louis police said: "We find that 13 percent of the children picked up after curfew are involved in various kinds of other police offenses."

Harry Fedele of the Cleveland Juvenile Bureau said: "It does help a great deal in keeping down juvenile crime. It permits us to nip gang fights in the bud by clearing the kids off the streets."

Describing the curfew as a "terrific help," San Francisco Police Chief Thomas J. Cahill said that "through a word of caution, we are able many times, we are sure, to prevent youngsters from getting into trouble."

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 2, 1959]

THE NEW FEUDALISM

Within a single week four more killings—all of them utterly senseless—have resulted from blood feuds involving the juvenile gangs of Manhattan. Some 1,400 New York City policemen have been diverted from other important duties to assist in the effort to repress such adolescent crimes of violence.

In a series of intergang collisions, or "rumbles," on the night of August 23, a 15-year-old girl was shot to death, and a 14-year-old boy was fatally stabbed on the lower east side. Four nights later in the west side district, long and notoriously known as Hell's Kitchen, two boys were stabbed to death in a public playground.

The second of these incidents was even uglier than the other; for the victims seem not to have been members of any rival gang and the assailants seem to have had no special grievance against them. The assailants, it appears, were young Puerto Ricans representing gangs from another neighborhood known variously by such grandiose designations as the Young Lords, the Heart

Kings, and the Vampires. Apparently they were in search of another young Puerto Rican who had insulted and threatened one of their members. Not finding him, they sought to slake their spirit of vengeance on a group of neighborhood youths, mostly of Greek or Slavic ancestry.

The police had little difficulty in identifying the participants in the disturbance. But the incident has let loose a long-brewing storm of criticism against Mayor Wagner's youth board, which has been attempting to resolve the problem of juvenile violence by seeking close and confidential relationships with the adolescent gangs that would enable it to arrange truces or peace treaties among them.

This, according to the critics, amounts to a virtual recognition of the gangs as sovereign powers. And indeed the juvenile gang, with its elaborate organization, its claim to a particular territorial jurisdiction, of "turf," does manifest many characteristics of the political state, an imperium in imperio. Man, said Aristotle, is by nature a political animal, and the gang is another proof of the truth of this assertion. It affords a form of citizenship to those for whom the larger political community has no meaning. It offers to a frightened and rootless generation the sense of protecting, of participation, of "belonging"; but, like the "polis" and the Nation, it exacts in return a sacrificial loyalty and obedience.

FEDERAL AND PRIVATE AID TO EDUCATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that Federal aid to education, notwithstanding the terrible things that are often anticipated about it, is working out magnificently well. The Federal Education Commissioner has just completed his anniversary report on the National Defense Education Act, which Congress passed just a year ago, and he has nothing but good things to say about it, in the main.

For one thing, the student loan program, which I had the honor, with other Senators, to pioneer here, and which I think the Congress was most farsighted in adopting, rather than the outright grant idea, is working remarkably well, Commissioner Derthick says. I quote him:

> Field representatives report tremendous enthusiasm in all parts of the country for the student loan program.

Again, it is a demonstration of the fact that our young people are hardy and are willing to take responsibility, and are not going soft, as so many people think, but are willing to invest in their education and repay the loan as soon as they get employment. The whole program shows a most promising picture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a report upon this subject from an article in the New York Times of this morning be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDUCATION CHIEF HAILS YEAR'S GAIN—DERTHICK'S REPORT DETAILS PROGRESS ON SCHOOL AID UNDER 1958 LEGISLATION

(By Bess Furman)

WASHINGTON, September 1.—Dr. Lawrence Derthick today hailed the first year's record of the National Defense Education Act as really impressive.

The Federal Education Commissioner has just compiled an anniversary report on the complicated legislation. It was enacted by Congress to meet the challenge implicit in the launching of Russian space satellites. President Eisenhower signed the 4-year, billion-dollar measure last September 2.

In tallying the results, Dr. Derthick first praised the American free-education system. He said "54 States and Territories" had enthusiastically accepted the Federal plan.

From the outset, he said, State agencies and institutions of higher learning have helped develop rules, regulations, and guidelines, and have given voluntary testimony that no Federal control of education has resulted from the act.

COINCIDES WITH VISIT

By coincidence, the report comes in the month that Nikita S. Khrushchev, Soviet Premier, will visit this country. Also, the final report of the first official education mission to the Soviet Union, which was headed by Dr. Derthick, is scheduled for release next week.

Among the gains of the last year reported by Dr. Derthick were these:

"The act is accomplishing its purpose of channeling talented high school seniors into college.

"It is regarded as a 'lifesaver' by colleges, since it is starting to produce a new group of doctors of philosophy as future college teachers. The shortage of such teachers is critical.

"Under its provisions, States have tooled up to start supplying high schools this month with modern scientific and language-teaching equipment.

"It has stepped up vocational education in scientific fields.

"It is spreading student counseling, the teaching of languages hitherto rarely on the curriculum, including Russian; the use of television as a teaching tool and the use of modern tabulating machines for uniform education statistics."

Details given by the Commissioner included the following on principal programs:

STUDENT LOANS

A total of $1 million has been distributed to 1,192 colleges, and an additional 180 are starting loan programs this fall. The program now covers colleges representing 88 percent of the total enrollment. The new appropriation raises Federal loan funds to $61 million, not enough to meet the demand. A special consultant panel has developed a procedure for reviewing requests to insure maximum benefits from loans.

"Field representatives report tremendous enthusiasm in all parts of the country for the student loan program," Dr. Derthick said.

"Although this program is in its infancy, it may be confidently stated that thousands of students who are planning to attend college this fall would have found it impossible to continue their education without the aid given through Federal loans."

FELLOWSHIPS

A thousand fellowships have been awarded at an estimated cost of $5,300,000. Those consist of a $2,000 annual stipend for each fellow, plus $400 for each dependent. A few started to study in the summer; most start this month. Fifteen hundred more fellowships will be awarded about April 1.

"Smaller colleges are asking talented graduates to seek fellowships and return as faculty members," Dr. Derthick said.

EQUIPMENT

Plans by 49 States to purchase scientific and language-teaching aids and to repair laboratories have been approved, and $33,748,097 has been certified to for distribution to them.

Applications for $1,104,919 in loans to purchase similar equipment for 88 private schools in 32 States have been approved. Thirty-seven more applications totaling $428,193 have been received, and probably will be approved this fiscal year.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as a part of the same subject, I think it is tremendously important to all of us to note that corporate gifts to higher education have risen most remarkably in the last year. Business and industry are reported to have given $136 million in 1958, as compared with $109 million in 1956. Corporate contributions for all philanthropic purposes rose from $418 million to $550 million in the same period.

The significance of that fact is the great capitalist revolution in which corporations, in beginning to recognize their trusteeship for the public interest, are demonstrating that sense of trusteeship in their responsibility for great public activities like education.

It seems to me that there is a very intimate connection between the possible continued existence of private colleges—in the United States and the willingness of American business and individual Americans to support them, in order to enable them to continue their service to the whole country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this news story from the New York Times may be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CORPORATE GIFTS TO SCHOOLS RISE—RECORD $136 MILLION GIVEN IN 1958 DESPITE RECESSION, NATIONAL SURVEY FINDS—COLLEGES GET MOST AID—23.5 PERCENT INCREASE OVER 1956 BY 215 COMPANIES NOTED—EIGHT IN RED CONTRIBUTE

Despite the recent economic recession, corporate aid to education set a record last year, the Council for Financial Aid to Education reported yesterday.

Business and industry gave about $136 million to education in 1958, compared with $109 million in 1956, according to council projections. Corporate contributions for all philanthropic purposes rose from $418 million to $550 million over this period.

The council reported the findings of its third biennial survey, which covered 1958. The council said that a new check of 215 companies in the 1956 study had showed a 23.5-percent increase in education grants. These companies gave $40,917,571 in 1958, against $33,140,806 2 years ago.

Dr. Frank H. Sparks, president of the council, said the increases "were made during an off-profit year."

"This is encouraging evidence that the most alert business management in the world regards the financial support of higher education as of the first importance," he said.

EIGHT GAVE DESPITE LOSS

The survey found that eight companies contributed despite operating losses last year. One concern, through its foundation, gave almost four times as much as it earned.

A total of 352 of the Nation's largest corporations took part in the 1958 survey. Of this number, 137 were new or first-time respondents.

This, the council said, led it to believe that many more companies had begun contributing to education.

Most of the companies, the report noted, gave their gifts to institutions of higher education. Eighty-one companies gave to junior or community colleges, and 65 to pre-college institutions. A preference was shown for supporting private institutions, the council said, although 126 companies reported gifts to publicly controlled institutions. Unaccredited colleges received grants from 39 companies.

THIRTY-FOUR PERCENT UNRESTRICTED

Unrestricted gifts to education amounted to $16,619,255, or a little more than 34 percent of the total $48,771,277 given by the 352 companies.

The breakdown of designated gifts was as follows:

	Amount	Percent of total
Buildings and equipment	$8,257,244	16.9
Student financial aid	7,298,303	15.0
Graduate/professional education	5,703,049	11.7
Basic research	2,841,489	5.8
Departmental grants	1,553,742	3.2
Faculty compensation	1,498,417	3.1
Endowment	451,275	0.9
Other purposes	4,519,503	9.2

Other major findings of the survey were:

Education received 28.4 percent of corporate gifts in 1958, according to the 339 companies reporting their total programs.

The greatest increase in aid to education, 210 percent, came from banking concerns.

Twenty-eight companies—twice the 1956 number—contributed to education last year at the rate of 1 percent or more of net income before taxes.

DISCRIMINATORY MEMBERSHIP POLICIES OF 40 AND 8

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, last week on the Senate floor I protested the unfortunate action taken by a majority of the delegates to the American Legion annual convention when they voted down a proposal which would have abolished the discriminatory membership rules of a Legion affiliate, the 40 and 8, which permits only white males to join. Such restrictions obviously bar Negro veterans and those of oriental descent.

I said at that time that any such action directly contradicts the very basis of our Constitution and the very basis of the development of the American Legion itself, which, under its constitution, welcomes all U.S. citizens who have served honorably in time of war.

As a member of the Legion, I stated at that time that I would not resign, but would join in the fight against this attitude in the Legion. I urged my view on the newly elected national commander, who, to my great pleasure, and that of my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING], happens to be a New Yorker, Martin B. McKneally, from Newburgh, N.Y., whom I happen to know personally. He has already released a public statement, and indeed my colleague from New York [Mr. KEATING] introduced that statement into the RECORD. But Mr. McKneally has sent me a telegram today which I think would also be of interest to Members of this body, especially commenting upon my feeling that the thing to do is not to resign from the American Legion, but to fight within the American Legion; to stay in the American Legion and help to preserve, maintain, and improve the Legion as an influence for the preservation of American ideals.

I say wholeheartedly I feel fortified in my decision not to resign from the American Legion, but to work for action within the Legion with my comrades to reverse the action of the convention delegates, about which we feel so badly, and which I feel is most unwise not only in the eyes of Americans, but in the eyes of people of the free world.

I pledge myself as a member of the Legion to follow this action very closely, and the action which the new national commander proposes to take, namely, to appoint a committee to look into this question. I promise him my full cooperation. I feel much honored that my fellow New Yorker, Martin B. McKneally, has shown by this action the true qualities of a national commander of the American Legion. I am very happy to serve under him.

I ask unanimous consent that the telegram to which I have referred may be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., August 31, 1959.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
The U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Thank you for the kind sentiments expressed in your recent telegram. May I laud you for the position taken by you in connection with the 40 and 8? I trust that all others will follow your example and stay in or join the American Legion and help us to preserve and maintain and improve this great organization as an influence for the preservation of American ideals. The following was released to all news media today:

"An issue raised at the recent national convention of the American Legion in Minneapolis has received much public comment and calls for a statement from me as the national commander.

"The comment is based upon the rejection of a resolution by the convention which declared the eligibility requirements of the 40 and 8 to be in violation of the constitution of the American Legion and called for immediate compliance by the 40 and 8 with the American Legion constitution.

"The convention, it must be borne in mind, did not stop there. It adopted the report of the constitution and bylaws committee of the convention, which declared that exclusion of members because of race, creed, or color in either the Legion or its subsidiary organization 'is presently considered unlawful.' It also passed a resolution which called upon the 40 and 8 to reexamine its eligibility requirements with the purpose of making them coincide with those of the American Legion.

"This resolution, while general in tone, nevertheless calls for immediate action by the American Legion.

"As national commander, it is my responsibility to see that that action is not delayed. For the information of all, I shall state my own personal position in this matter.

"(1) I believe that the essential requirements for eligibility in the American Legion, as set out in its constitution, should not be added to by a subsidiary organization. The 40 and 8, which is an independent corporation, restricts its membership to legionnaires who are 'white males.' The membership requirements of the American Legion, be it noted, are simple: honorable service by U.S. citizens in time of war, and none other.

"(2) I beleive that American Legion, composed as it is of veterans of three wars which were fought for the preservation of freedom and human dignity, should be in the forefront in promoting brotherhood and should be the leader in allaying prejudice.

"(3) I am required in this connection to do all that lies within my power to uphold the constitution of the American Legion, and to do less would be a clear violation of my obligations as national commander.

"I shall appoint a committee to meet with the 40 and 8 to discuss and clarify and to bring to a proper conclusion this conflict; and I shall act in all these matters without delay.

"In conclusion, I say that my responsibility as national commander is to preserve the American Legion and all of its original greatness as the guardian of American ideals and to lead this organization in the difficult days that lie ahead, and to act always in accordance with the highest and best traditions of the American Legion and of the United States of America."

I would appreciate your reaction.

MARTIN B. MCKNEALLY,
National Commander, the American Legion.

ORDER TO RECESS TO 11 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we have the usual morning hour when we convene tomorrow, for the transaction of routine business, with a limitation on statements of 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LAKE MICHIGAN WATER DIVERSION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have heard it said on the floor a number of times, and I think it was said only in a kind of effort to provoke our side, that we were filibustering. In this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald there is a fine editorial entitled "Snitching Great Lakes Water." I am going to read it because it is a complete answer to what I think is a superficial objection. I said yesterday that if someone would examine the RECORD and ascertain the amount of time that has been spent discussing the issue or issues, he would find that most of the time was consumed by extraneous matter.

The editorial reads:

Opponents of the Great Lakes water diversion bill are under charges of filibustering, but up to this point the debate seems to illustrate the basic difference—between a filibuster and vigorous discussion on a vital issue.

I emphasize "the basic difference"—

I interject at this point to say that last night it was my privilege to see the President of the United States on television. The telecast came from England, and he was discussing matters with Mr. Macmillan. Among other things, he spoke very feelingly about the fact that for some 140-odd years we have lived at peace with our great neighbor to the north of us. There were no battlewagons, there were no fortifications on the border between the two countries, but we were living at peace. But he brought out the idea, further, it was imperative that we continue that condition, especially in these days when we are facing conditions which may blow up the world in our faces unless we use judgment and reason.

I continue reading:

A filibuster is a time wasting device to prevent action by the Senate after all the arguments are in. Though many arguments have been repeated in the debate on the water diversion bill, the net effect has been to alert the country and the Senate to the dangers of a measure that has been too little understood.

Yes; it is too little understood. In the time of the little arguing we have done on the floor—and I have done very little—the seats have been empty, as they are now. We are only getting into the minds of Senators the vital issue; that is, we must not kick Canada, the best friend we ever had, in the teeth.

I continue to read the editorial:

Though many arguments have been repeated in the debate on the water diversion bill, the net effect has been to alert the country and the Senate to the dangers of a measure that has been too little understood. What now appears to be a very large minority opposing the bill may become a majority.

The arguments for not rushing into a venture of this sort are very persuasive. Senator MCNAMARA pointed out that four cases involving water diversion from Lake Michigan are now before the Supreme Court and that a special master appointed by the Court will soon begin taking testimony on every facet of this problem. It is well to remember that Chicago's existing right of diversion stems from the Court's decree of 1930. Even if legislation should seem ultimately desirable, Congress could legislate to far better advantage after the Court has further spelled out the legal issues.

Another strong argument for not passing the bill now is that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has had no opportunity to study it. On Monday the Senate refused by a narrow margin to send the bill to Foreign Relations, but Canada's objections to the bill remain strong. It would be inexcusable to pass the bill without a full analysis of these objections and the impact that such action would have upon relations between the United States and Canada.

I repeat:

It would be inexcusable to pass the bill without a full analysis of these objections and the impact that such action would have upon relations between the United States and Canada.

Sponsors of the bill try to justify riding roughshod over Canada's wishes regarding these international waters by saying that officials in Ottawa have shifted their position in the last year—

I deny that statement. I expect to speak today, to show there has been no shift of position. If we were to tell the truth, it would relate to the actions in our own State Department on that issue, rather than a change in the position of the Canadian Government—

Spokesmen for Canada deny this emphatically, but even if it were true wo do not see that it would have any substantial bearing on the issue now before the Senate. There is no question whatever about Canada's present resentment over the effort to take water without her consent from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system jointly owned by the two countries, and it is current attitudes and policies that have to be reckoned with.

There are strong indications, moreover, that in any event approval of the bill by the Senate would be only a gesture. President Eisenhower would doubtless veto this measure as he has done in the case of two similar bills—in part because it would divert Canadian-United States water without any negotiations on the subject with Canada. It is said that some Senators are being urged to vote for the bill as a means of conciliating the sponsors because the President will prevent it from becoming effective—

Yesterday that issue was met head on by my distinguished associate from Wisconsin, who is doing a tremendous job on the floor of the Senate, and has been carrying most of the argument so far.

I will say definitely, in my opinion this is a Government of divided powers. We legislators cannot shift our responsibility to the President; and, vice versa, the President cannot shift his responsibility to us. In my humble opinion, it is our function to get acquainted with the facts. In my opinion, this is the most significant and far-reaching piece of proposed legislation which has come before the Senate this session. Its consequences would be such that if we do the wrong thing we will alienate, as the Canadian note implies, a large section of our friends to the north.

I continue to read the editorial:

Surely the opposite reasoning ought to prevail in a responsible legislative body. Since a veto seems inevitable, why would any Senator wish to antagonize our good neighbor to the north by a futile gesture that will serve no other purpose?

Mr. President, in view of my disjointed discussion, so to speak, of the issues involved, I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I congratulate the Senator from Wisconsin for the self-criticism in which the Senator has indulged, in stating his remarks were disjointed. I congratulate the Senator on the accuracy of his observation.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, if I may reply to that, I am sure the brilliant remark, the scintillating remark, the wonderful professorial remark of the distinguished Senator from Illinois really does not merit any response, but I kind of love those old grey hairs of his, because at times his mind becomes very irrational.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired. The Senator may seek recognition in his own right.

Mr. PROXMIRE subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today my senior colleague [Mr. WILEY], who is doing a fine job in fighting against the enactment of H.R. 1, not only in the interest of Wisconsin, but also in the behalf of all the Great Lakes States and the other interested States, and to make sure that our country gives proper consideration to the interests of Canada, placed an insertion in the RECORD which I wish to refer to at this time.

I ask unanimous consent that my remarks on this editorial appear immediately after earlier remarks of my senior colleague from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there are two or three important points I wish to mention in respect to this editorial.

First, it appears in a neutral newspaper. The Washington Post, of course, has no reason to favor Chicago, New York, Wisconsin, or Canada. It is a newspaper which can speak out from its conscience and on the merits, without regard to any special commercial or industrial interest.

In the second place, as my distinguished colleague has mentioned, the editorial in the Washington Post points out the opponents of this bill have not and are not engaging in a filibuster. The first sentence reads:

Opponents of the Great Lakes water diversion bill are under charges of filibustering, but up to this point the debate seems to illustrate the basic difference between a filibuster and vigorous discussion on a vital issue.

Yesterday we discussed H.R. 1 at substantial length. In the course of the discussion, we who oppose the bill stuck to the point just as much as we could. When I held the floor for a considerable period yesterday afternoon, at no time did I depart during the debate from my discussion of the merits of the bill. On one occasion I was questioned on interest rates, which subjects, of course, is neither germane nor relevant to H.R. 1. It is interesting to note, however, that my interrogators were proponents of the bill. They included the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] and the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], both of whom have voted for the bill. We were questioned at some length on interest rates, for a period of perhaps a half hour.

Except for that discussion, we stayed right on the proposed legislation. The only interruption was when my good friend, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], departed from the discussion on the bill to discuss the question of filibuster itself, which, as the Washington Post editorial points out, is not pertinent to the discussion of this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I have one further remark to make on this editorial. I call attention to the last paragraph.

The conclusion reached in the last paragraph may be erroneous. It reads:

President Eisenhower would doubtless veto this measure as he has done in the case of two similar bills.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope that the Washington Post is right, but the conclusion as to a veto is based on the fact that the President has vetoed two similar bills. I call attention to the fact that when those bills were vetoed the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] was not the minority leader. He was not the spokesman for the President in the U.S. Senate. Today the junior Senator from Illinois, who is a strong proponent of the bill, a man to whom this bill is of very great interest, is the President's spokesman.

I know the President is a fine man. He is a man who will act on the basis of the merits. But the fact is that the President is an extremely busy man. He has many other concerns. It is entirely possible that the enormously persuasive influence of the junior Senator from Illinois, which he has already demonstrated on votes previously taken on the bill, may prevail on the President. For this reason I hope that Senators will recognize that if they vote for this bill and it passes, there is a possibility that the President of the United States may sign the bill and it would become law.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from Vermont for a question.

Mr. AIKEN. I hope the Senator has observed that, in spite of the position of the leadership on this side of the aisle, the majority of Republicans have voted against this water steal, and in favor of preserving our treaty with Canada, in every record vote which has been taken on the bill.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am delighted the Senator from Vermont has pointed out that fact. He is correct. There is no doubt that the agencies of our Government support the opposition to this bill. The agencies which are under the President of the United States feel strongly that the President should veto the bill if it shall be passed. But I say he may not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the Senator think this information will be extremely valuable to carry to the voters of Chicago and Illinois about the position of the Republicans and of the administration? Does not the Senator think that would be very good information to carry to the voters of Illinois?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I presume it would be of great use in Illinois. I can understand why the Senator from Illinois has asked this question of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Mrs. Oswald B. Lord, of New York, to be an alternate representative of the United States of America to the 14th session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, to serve no longer than December 31, 1959.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Harold Riegelman, of New York, to be an alternate representative of the United States of America to the 14th session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, to serve no longer than December 31, 1959.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about the confirmation of the nominations of the delegates and alternate delegates to the United Nations.

I have with great pleasure this morning found upon the list two men who are personal friends of mine of years standing, with whom I have enjoyed a close and very happy relationship. They are men of such service and distinction for our country that I shall take only a brief moment of the Senate's time to say a word about them.

The first is JAMES G. FULTON, a Representative in Congress from the State of Pennsylvania; and the other is Harold Riegelman, of New York.

JIM FULTON is probably the closest friend I had in the House of Representatives. We sat together on the Committee on Foreign Affairs for 8 years, and we fought many battles for what I consider to be and for what he considers to be the constructive foreign policy for the United States. I wish to pay him a special tribute, as the chairman of a small subcommittee of 3 which went to Europe in 1947, and helped mightily to produce the Displaced Persons Act of 1948. As a result of the investigation which Representative FULTON, Representative CHELF, of Kentucky, and I, then being a Representative from New York, made of the displaced persons camps, visiting personally some 750 of them, and bringing back to the House of Representatives a personal report, I feel we had an enormous impact upon the House and were heavily responsible for the Displaced Persons Act. Of all the fine things Representative FULTON has done, Mr. President, I think his chairmanship of that subcommittee in the 80th Congress will always be his finest ornament.

Mr. President, Harold Riegelman is one of our very distinguished New Yorkers, a one-time Republican candidate for mayor of New York, a leading citizen in the community sense and in every way, well known to every New Yorker as an agreeably astute and as a liberal-minded watchdog of the public purse. Mr. Riegelman is now, I suppose, entitled to be called Ambassador. He is a very distinguished member of a fine New York law firm, and has never been a lawyer who, notwithstanding his success, has denied to the public service one moment of his time. He has a most illustrious record, as is evident from the papers on file with the committee. It is a great personal pleasure to me to note the preferment which has been vouchsafed to him today.

Mr. President, I also have two other friends upon this list, CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, from the House of Representatives, who will also represent our country, as a delegate, and Mrs. Oswald B. Lord. I congratulate both of them upon their confirmation today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the very generous statement my friend from New York has made about Representative FULTON and Representative ZABLOCKI. I have known them for many years, and have a very high regard for them. The President has made two very good appointments in honoring them.

I have noted with a great deal of interest and approval the very excellent service former Senator Lodge is rendering at the United Nations, and I am glad to see the Senate take favorable action in connection with all these nominations.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on this same matter, I should like to say that the Honorable CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI is the Representative from the Fourth District in Milwaukee. He is continuing to render very fine service on the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He has had a number of very difficult assignments which he has discharged very ably, and I am very proud that he is being confirmed this morning. I am sure that in appointing him the President has shown very good judgment. I am sure that CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI will serve the Nation well. He is certainly eminently qualified.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Harry F. Stimpson, Jr., of Massachusetts, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Paraguay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

U.S. DISTRICT JUDGES

The Chief Clerk read sundry nominations of U.S. district judges.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

JUDGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Walter A. Gordon, of California, to be judge of the District Court for the Virgin Islands for a term of 8 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask that the President be notified of all nominations confirmed today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President will be notified forthwith.

Mr. WILEY subsequently said: Mr. President, with regard to the nominees to the United Nations, I am personally acquainted with Henry Cabot Lodge; Representative James G. Fulton, of Pennsylvania; Representative Clement J. Zablocki, of Wisconsin; Walter S. Robertson, of Virginia; and George Meany, of Maryland. I am also acquainted with Mrs. Oswald B. Lord, of New York.

I approve everything that was said by my associate [Mr. PROXMIRE] in relation to Representative ZABLOCKI. All the nominees to whom I have referred are great Americans. I am satisfied that they will perform a distinguished service in the United Nations. I only wish I could be there and watch them. They are dedicated individuals, who recognize the significance of the United Nations in this age.

Mr. KUCHEL subsequently said: Mr. President, the name of a distinguished American, a longtime able lawyer and a native Californian has been sent to the Senate as a nominee by the President of the United States to be judge of the District Court for the Virgin Islands. In confirming Walter A. Gordon to be a member of the Federal judiciary today, the Senate has approved a thoroughly competent and distinguished attorney, a very able public servant, and, beyond that, one whose whole lifetime does infinite credit to the maxim that in free America people are created free and equal and each citizen advances in accordance with his own zeal and his own ability, his own capacity and his own labor.

Years ago Federal Judge Walter A. Gordon was a student at the University of California. He graduated in law from that great institution as a doctor of jurisprudence. He was a great athlete. He was an all-American football player at his alma mater. He practiced law in his home county of Alameda with distinction. Subsequently the Governor of California, now the distinguished Chief Justice of the United States, appointed him first as a member and then as chairman for almost a decade of the California Adult Authority, where he performed an invaluable and outstanding public service, recognized by the bench and bar and the general public alike.

The President of the United States appointed Judge Gordon the Governor of the Virgin Islands, in which as chief executive of that American possession he achieved a great reputation among the people over whose public problems he sat in judgment as chief administrator.

Judge Gordon is a family man. He and Mrs. Gordon have three children,

Walter Jr., Edwin C., and Betty Mae. The two sons were in the American Army during World War II. One was commissioned an officer on the field of battle for bravery.

The people of my State feel a sense of pride in the action of the Senate in confirming Walter A. Gordon, of California, as judge of the District Court for the Virgin Islands and in the judgment of the President in nominating him.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider legislative business.

DEFINITION OF TERMS USED IN DEBATE OVER LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, there is a slight possibility that there might be some discussion of the labor bill on the floor, although I am more and more hopeful by the hour that we will reach general rapport before the day is over. However, there always exists the possibility that we might have one or two unresolved parts of the bill now in conference. I have therefore prepared a glossary of terms which might be used in any debate which might ensue over any legislation. I am also mailing a copy of it to each of my colleagues, because I find in speaking to them there is a general misunderstanding of many of these terms, which seem rather simple to those who live with them day after day.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this definition of terms that may be used in a debate over labor legislation be made a part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the glossary of terms was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFINITIONS OF TERMS USED IN THE CURRENT DEBATE OVER LABOR LEGISLATION

1. Secondary boycott: A secondary boycott involves the application of pressure—usually economic pressure—on one company for the purpose of forcing it to stop doing business with another company. There are two types of secondary boycotts: the secondary employee boycott and the secondary consumer boycott.

A secondary employee boycott involves the refusal of employees of a neutral or third party employer to perform work for the purpose of compelling their employer to cease doing business with another employer.

A secondary consumer, or customer, boycott involves the refusal of consumers or customers to buy the products or services of one employer in order to force him to stop doing business with another employer.

It is generally agreed that the Taft-Hartley Act was intended to outlaw the inducement of secondary employee boycotts. The language of the act does not touch the secondary consumer boycott. The current discussion in regard to secondary boycotts relates to making more effective the prohibition against secondary employee boycotts and the question of adding a prohibition against secondary consumer boycotts. Among terms commonly used in secondary boycott discussions are the following:

(a) Primary employer: He is the employer involved in the primary dispute with the union.

(b) Secondary employer: He is the employer who does business with the primary employer that is engaged in a labor dispute.

(c) Common situs: The term refers to the physical location, such as a construction project, where the employees of more than one employer are performing work at the same time.

The question of picketing at a common situs is at issue. The present law has been interpreted to permit picketing at the common situs only under very limited circumstances, one of which is that the employer with whom the union has a primary dispute does not have a regular place of business in the area.

(d) Hot cargo clause: This is a provision in a collective bargaining contract which seeks to permit employees to refuse to perform work on materials or equipment received from or being sent to another employer with whom the union has a primary dispute.

Under early Board and court decisions, hot cargo clauses were accepted as a valid defense to otherwise unlawful conduct. Subsequent decisions have changed the rule. Hot cargo provisions are no longer a valid defense to otherwise unlawful conduct under the secondary boycott provisions of the act.

(e) Struck work: Struck work is work which is farmed out or subcontracted to another employer because of the existence of a strike in the primary employer's shop.

Under the present act the Board and the courts have, under certain circumstances, found no violation of the secondary boycott section of the act where employees of a secondary employer have refused to handle work from another employer which would have been handled by his own employees but for the existence of a strike.

2. Picketing:

(a) Blackmail or coercive picketing: This is a general term referring to picketing which has the effect of coercing employees in the exercise of their right to freely select or reject a bargaining agent.

For more than 5 years the Board and the courts held that the Taft-Hartley Act did not restrict such picketing except where the picketing was designed to compel an employer to bargain with one union where another union had already been certified. Within the past several years, Board and court thinking has changed and now, under certain circumstances, such picketing will be regarded as a violation of section 8(b)(1) of the act.

(b) Organizational picketing: This is picketing which ostensibly is directed toward urging employees to join a union.

(c) Recognition picketing: This is picketing which has as its objective compelling the employer to recognize the union as the bargaining agent for its employees without an election.

Some State courts have tried to make a distinction between organizational and recognition picketing, permitting the former while prohibiting the latter. In some cases, the difference in the objective of the picketing may be obvious; in other cases the difference turns on rather small facts.

3. Strikes: A strike is a concerted refusal on the part of employees to perform work. A strike can be either primary or secondary.

(a) Economic strike: This is a strike which takes place because of a dispute over wages, hours, and working conditions. Such a strike is really a primary employee boycott.

(b) Unfair labor practice strike: The purpose of such a strike is to counter what the union alleges to be the company's unfair labor practices.

(c) Recognition strike: This is a strike to compel the company to recognize the union as the bargaining agent for a group of employees without an election.

4. No-man's land: The phrase refers to those businesses in the United States over which the National Labor Relations Board could, but has declined to, exercise jurisdiction and over which State courts and agencies have been, by Supreme Court decisions, precluded from exercising jurisdiction in certain basic matters relating to labor relations. These companies and their employees are currently without a forum which can consider such basic matters as representation and unfair labor practices.

The courts have generally held that Congress, in passing the Wagner Act in 1935 and the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, intended to exercise its full authority under the commerce clause in the Constitution. Thus, the NLRB was empowered to exercise jurisdiction over all enterprises engaged in interstate commerce and all enterprises whose activities affected interstate commerce. The Board, for administrative reasons, has never exercised its full jurisdiction. Until about 3 years ago State courts and State agencies generally operated in those areas in which the National Board could have acted but did not. Then, beginning with the Supreme Court's decision in the Garner case, State courts and agencies have been increasingly restricted in their activities in this area on the theory that, for certain important purposes, Federal law has preempted the field.

PROPOSED BOYCOTT OF TOUGH-LABOR-BILL BACKERS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I cannot speak of the legality or the morality of the action I am about to bring to the attention of the Senate, but I have in my hand a very interesting clipping from the Louisville Courier Journal, which indicates that the executive secretary of the Kentucky State AFL–CIO is publishing the names of firms which wrote their Representatives asking that the Landrum-Griffin bill be passed. In other words, this is a new way of getting a blacklist. The State AFL–CIO are urging that people not trade with these American businessmen who saw in their own hearts the need for stronger legislation than the Senate passed, and who urged their Representatives in Congress to vote their wishes.

This labor leader is probably well within his legal rights in doing this, he may be within his moral rights, but, Mr. President, this is the kind of thing that has to stop in this country, on both sides. We have to stop blacklisting union members because management does not agree with them. We have to stop blacklisting management because the union does not happen to agree with them.

I am a little surprised that after the uncalled-for letter of James Carey, another labor leader in the country should see fit to expose one of labor's weak flanks to the public at this particular time. I hope my colleagues will take note of what I am referring to.

I ask unanimous consent that this clipping from the Louisville Courier Journal be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EZELLE URGES BOYCOTTING TOUGH-LABOR-BILL BACKERS—WOULDN'T BUY FROM RETAILERS WHO WROTE CONGRESSMEN—SAYS UNDER 100 FIRMS INVOLVED

Louisville area organized labor was urged last night to quit buying from retailers who wrote Congressmen to back tough labor legislation.

Sam Ezelle, executive secretary of the Kentucky State AFL–CIO, said the Kentucky Labor News would publish the names of the firms that wrote Congressmen.

The paper, official organ of the State labor body which has about 100,000 members, has already published a list of 13 firms here that urged adoption of the labor-hated Landrum-Griffin bill.

Ezelle made his boycott recommendation in a report on Federal legislation to the Louisville Central Labor Council.

"I am more than a little tired of this 1-day-a-week romance with storekeepers," he said. "They love us on payday and the rest of the week they write letters to Frankfort urging a right-to-work law and to Washington for a Landrum-Griffin bill."

Ezelle said he had ways of finding out which stores wrote Congressmen.

"Don't ask me how, but I can find out," he said.

He said, in addition to publishing the names in the State publication, lists would be sent to local unions.

"Now I'm not saying don't buy from them," he said. "But as good unionists you know what to do and it won't be a secondary boycott."

Ezelle estimated that there are a little less than 100 stores involved.

The CLC endorsed Ezelle's proposal.

In other action, the CLC voted a $100 donation to Kosair Crippled Children Hospital, heard a plea from Louisville police officers for support to get higher wages, and an address from University of Louisville President Philip Davidson.

Detective Charles Yates, speaking for the Louisville Police Officers Association, asked organized labor's help in circulating, and signing petitions to the board of aldermen asking for a pay raise.

Davidson told the meeting of the university's development plans.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield for a question, I do not know whether he can answer this or not, but I should like to ask a question relative to the conference on the labor-management bill. Is consideration being given to the possibility of exempting the clothing and garment trades so that they can continue on the same basis on which they operate at the present time?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I might say that, thanks to the help of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], we have been able to devise language which will accomplish that result. The conferees have been in complete accord that this should be done all the way through, but we were unable to get language that would satisfy the desire, and not at the same time expand it to cover any number of other firms. In other words, we did not want to exempt all industries from the hot cargo provisions of the bill, but I can assure the distinguished Senator from Montana that the language is before us, that we are agreed on it, and I am very hopeful, as I said earlier, that some time today we can reach complete agreement.

I may say, in concluding my reply, that in my opinion we have only one stumbling block, and that is what we call the construction situs, which was offered as an amendment to the Senate bill, and which was defeated on the Senate floor, and which was part of the Elliott bill which was defeated. It is not contained in the House bill, and is not contained in either bill. It is extraneous. It has absolutely no application to the disclosures before the McClellan committee.

All the members of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee have given their word that they would take this whole subject of the construction industry up at the next session, and give it their full attention. This is in no way construction situs, in no way solves the problems of the construction industry. I am very hopeful that during the course of the day the forces working for the inclusion of this stumbling block will recede, that they will realize that reasonable men will keep their word and do something about it next year. To me it is unheard of to include in a conference report a piece of legislation that was turned down by both Houses and has no application to labor reform. So I am hopeful that we can overcome the effort.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator for his words of encouragement relative to what may well be a final solution to protect the good labor relations now existing in the clothing and garment trade industries, and I hope that the other matters will be considered and resolved also.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I can assure the Senator I have a deep interest in this. As the Senator knows, I have been a retailer all of my life. I have worked in what we call the garment sections of New York, Los Angeles, St. Louis, and Chicago. I know this problem intimately. I would be the last one who would want to see this relationship upset.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator, and I hope that the construction trades matter will be settled satisfactorily.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. JAVITS addressed the Chair.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have promised to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would not the Senator from Arizona agree with me that the able and persistent efforts of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], have contributed greatly to the exemption of the garment trades and of the building trades from provisions found objectionable, and that the forces that have been trying to punish these unions have come primarily from the coalition of rightwing Republicans and of some of our brethren from south of the Mason and Dixon line?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, with the first part of that question I can agree wholeheartedly, and I go further and say that all members of this conference have been extremely helpful. There has been no party feeling. There has been no politics.

As to the second part of the question, I challenge my friend from Illinois to describe one punitive measure in this bill he can ascribe to Democrats or Republicans. I regret that at this late hour the Senator decides to inject partisan politics in something that has not been in our deliberations so far.

I regret that at this late hour he decides to inject partisan politics into what has not been partisan politics.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is certainly true that in the bill passed by the House there were a number of punitive measures.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Can the Senator name one?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly; a complete ban on organizational picketing.

Mr. GOLDWATER. There was no complete ban on organizational picketing. The Senator has not read the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Landrum-Griffin bill virtually bans all forms of organizational picketing.

Mr. GOLDWATER. "Virtually" is a long way from "complete." I suggest that the Senator further explore the field. He will find that the word "virtually" does not even apply.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Arizona be allowed 2 additional minutes in order that he may yield to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Arizona in yielding to me. I think I know a little about the garment trade exemption. I found no member of the conference committee who did not want to provide for it, though there was considerable difference of opinion as to how it might best be done. But during my talks with members of the conference committee, I found unanimity over the fact that elimination of the type of sweatshop practice which has been eliminated in the apparel business—at least it is on the way toward being eliminated, if it has not been completely eliminated as yet—should be encouraged, with special consideration in the proposed legislation.

I cannot testify with respect to other aspects of the bill, or characterize them. There are other sections of the bill, which I opposed here and in the other body, but I do know about the exemption for the garment trade. I felt very much that there was great goodwill manifested on all sides in an effort to solve this problem.

I think the Senator from Arizona has been too modest in speaking of his own part, which was most constructive and very helpful. I am very glad that the Senate is able to receive such a constructive report on this particular question.

As to the rest of the bill, I, like all my colleagues, have the expectation that we may be faced with a product which we can accept in an agreed-upon conference report.

THE DUNES OF INDIANA

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, as Members of this body know some months ago a number of us introduced a bill to set aside 5,000 acres of the Indiana sand dune areas as a national park. The distinguished present occupant of the chair [Mr. Moss] and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] made a trip to this area and submitted a very able report recommending that this be done.

I ask unanimous consent that a fine editorial supporting this effort, published in the San Francisco Chronicle of August 28, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. It shows that this is a national issue.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DUNES OF INDIANA

Along the Lake Michigan shoreline in Indiana two antagonists glare at each other across some 5,000 acres of wild and lonely sand dunes. They represent, in unusually clear definition, other and similar forces which have fought and are fighting on other wild and lonely fronts, including on at Point Reyes, only 30 miles from San Francisco.

On one side, equipped with bird books, cameras, binoculars, and easels are the conservationists. They would keep the land as it is. On the other side, bulldozers already fueled and snorting, is industry, in this case two giant steel corporations. They own the dunes, plan to slice a harbor between their holdings and set up huge steel mills. If they succeed, this last stretch of untouched lakefront will be lost forever as a place of retreat for city dwellers and nature lovers, especially those from nearby Chicago and Gary, both cities badly in need of refuge from the asphalt jungle.

Why should what happens to 3½ miles of sand, bog, and forest on the Lake Michigan shoreline be of concern to us 2,300 miles away? Much the same question was asked over 40 years ago at a hearing to establish a Federal Indiana Dunes Park. A New York conservationist answered it:

"In no sense is this a local question. People who live in New York have just as near and dear an interest in the preservation of recreational zones * * * on the shores of Lake Michigan as they have in the preservation of similar objects in Yellowstone Park, or the Yosemite Valley, or Niagara Falls, or in the city of New York itself."

If this is true in a general and philosophic sense, it is also now true in a specific one. A group of 17 conservation-minded Senators has introduced the SOS (save our shores) bill which calls for the Federal acquisition for parks of the 5,000 acres of Indiana dunes, the 35,000 acres of Point Reyes beach, brush, and forest, and some some 441,000 other acres of recreational shoreline from Cape Cod to California's Channel Islands. It should have the support of everyone who believes that man, like the living things he so often supplants, needs a refuge from his own works.

The beaches of Lake Michigan are a lot closer to those of California than geography would indicate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The editorial in the San Francisco Chronicle goes right to the point of the matter. This is not a struggle between Illinois and Indiana. It is a struggle between the conservationists and the giant industrial corporations, of National Steel and Bethlehem Steel, which wish to despoil one of the great natural beauty spots of the country and turn it over to industry.

Dealing with another, though somewhat cognate, matter, the effort on the part of many of us to preserve the dunes for the people of the country, including the people of Indiana, has met with great support inside the State of Indiana. Some 45,000 citizens, at least, of that State have signed petitions in support of our move to have a national monument created there.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a concurrent resolution which was introduced in the Indiana Legislature during the 1959 session.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 3

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact appropriate legislation to designate a certain area in Chicago, Cook County, Ill., as a national park and to convert the area, with Indiana help, into a dunes wonderland

Whereas certain Members of the Congress of the United States representing the sovereign State of Illinois are advocating the conversion of a portion of the State of Indiana's already limited shoreline bordering on Lake Michigan into a national park for cultural reasons; and

Whereas, they infer and imply that these cultural reasons far outweigh the quite apparent value that this particular area has as, potentially, one of the greatest industrial sectors in this country today; and

Whereas the boundless energy and unconfined zeal with which these worthy gentlemen press for the establishment of this area as a national park creates the suspicion that they may be working in concert with certain militant and well-financed groups, having business interests in and around the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, who are seeking to eliminate competition by putting a quietus upon the industrialization of this obviously valuable area, perverting the venerable power of eminent domain to personal advantage under the velvet glove guise of culture; and

Whereas others who have joined the clamorous chorus for culture seeking the establishment of a national park are, in truth and in fact, despoilers of the dunelands immediately adjoining the subject area, in that they have constructed exclusive summer home neighborhoods, occupied largely by Illinois residents, which are protected from the cultureless public by chain link fences and private police forces; and

Whereas the sovereign State of Indiana many years ago established a State park in the dunes area comprised of many thousands of acres which said State park still exists today, secure in its pristine beauty as a well preserved monument to the primeval past in spite of a heavy and constant Chicagoan and Illinoisan onslaught; and

Whereas, on the chance that a modicum of sincerity may be detected in this clarion call of culture, with deepest sympathy for the plight of the people of Illinois, whose national representatives must now inveigh against a sister State in order to supplement its park and recreation needs because of the improvidence of its State and local government, and with heartfelt sorrow for the pitiable condition of the once robust and vigorous city of Chicago, which now, like Ferdinand the Bull, would rather smell the duneland's wildflowers, instead of calling forth the powers of the land to build new jobs and virile industry; be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana (the Senate concurring):

SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby memorialized to enact appropriate legislation designating that area of the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, commonly known as the Loop, and extending eastward to the shores of Lake Michigan, as a national park.

SEC. 2. That such legislation further provides for the condemnation of all buildings in the area and that they be sold to the highest bidder and removed forthwith.

SEC. 3. That upon being notified that the area has been cleared, the State of Indiana shall immediately provide the city of Chicago with as much as is necessary of genuine duneland sand, sandfleas, slough and bog water, cattails, wildflower, scrub oak, fossils, and tin used-hops receptacles, so that an authentic dunes wonderland may be carefully reproduced.

SEC. 4. That the Congress of the United States advise the culture cacklers representing the State of Illinois to mind their own cotton pickin' business and we in Indiana will mind ours.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This concurrent resolution was introduced by Representative Robert E. Granelspacher, of Jasper, Ind., and Representative Otto Porgay, of South Bend, Ind. It is a very denunciatory resolution and I wish to read certain salient portions of it. The first section is as follows:

SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby memorialized to enact appropriate legislation designating that area of the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, commonly known as the Loop, and extending eastward to the shores of Lake Michigan, as a national park.

Section 2 reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That such legislation further provide for the condemnation of buildings in the area and that they be sold to the highest bidder and removed forthwith.

Section 3, in which the Indiana legislators proceed to defame their own dunes, read as follows:

SEC. 3. That upon being notified that the area has been cleared, the State of Indiana shall immediately provide the city of Chicago with as much as is necessary of genuine dune land sand, sand fleas, slough and bog water, cattails, wildflowers, scrub oak, fossils, and tin used-hops receptacles, so that an authentic dunes wonderland may be carefully reproduced.

Section 4 reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Congress of the United States advise the culture cacklers representing the State of Illinois to mind their own cotton-pickin' business and we in Indiana will mind ours.

I think this resolution should be kept as a museum piece to show the depths to which certain defamers of the city of Chicago may go.

I am very happy to say, for the reputation of the State of Indiana, that the resolution was not reported from committee. However, it does indicate the type of opposition which Chicago generally experiences whenever we try to do anything for the benefit of the country. We realize that some of this type of opposition exists in connection with our efforts to deal with the pollution problems which we of necessity face. It is very easy to defame a large city unjustly, but I do not think it appeals to the sober sense and ethical standards of the majority of the American people. At least that is my faith.

THE TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1958

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, before I begin my remarks, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed about 10 minutes additional time during the morning hour in order that I may complete them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Just about a year ago the President approved the Transportation Act of 1958. Its purpose was to assist railroads by aiding them to acquire, build, modernize, and maintain facilities, plants, and equipment so as to "encourage the employment of labor and to foster the preservation and development of a national transportation system adequate to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of the national defense." While the act we passed applied, in some respects, to all segments of transportation, the consideration that prompted our immediate action was the rapidly deteriorating situation of the railroads. It was the first comprehensive piece of legislation enacted by Congress in recent years to aid this great and indispensable industry. When passed, it was generally acclaimed by the public because the people knew that the railroads of the country were in dire financial plight and there were real fears that this vital link in our own transportation system might be broken beyond repair or restoration. That applies to my own section of the country, New England, and to the rest of the East, as well. Those of us in Congress who advocated its passage knew that it was no panacea for all of the ills of the railroad industry, but we thought it was a step in the right direction.

While we commemorate the anniversary of this legislation, let us remember that it is the duty of Congress not only to enact laws, but also to ascertain from time to time whether the laws passed have accomplished their intended purposes, and, if they have not, whether that failure is the result of inadequate legislation or of improper administration.

Briefly, the Transportation Act of 1958 was intended to do four things:

First. To provide, through Government guarantee, for loans to meet the emergency needs of carriers unable to borrow from private sources.

Second. To make it possible for railroads to more quickly prune out unnecessary and unprofitable trains.

Third. To put back, or retain, under Commission control the transportation of certain commodities which were escaping regulation as a result of court decisions.

Fourth. To permit the establishment of rates at levels designed to encourage the free play of natural economic forces in the division of traffic between competing modes of transportation.

There were other subjects then under consideration, many of which were controversial. To deal with these and other problems we directed the conduct of a comprehensive study to bring forth recommendations as to what Congress should do to get the most for the public out of our complex and rapidly expanding facilities for public transportation.

I think it is important for us to note that in spelling out these remedies, we did something revolutionary in transportation. Always before Congress has imposed increasingly restrictive measures. The railroads for decades have been considered a monopoly. Restriction was placed upon restriction until we finally realized that we had charged the Interstate Commerce Commission with the virtually impossible task of dividing the traffic between the various modes of transportation. Congress and the courts had gone counter to the antitrust principles which apply in other industry and had so construed the rule of ratemaking as to make it almost impossible for one form of transportation to reduce its rates if that reduction would, in the opinion of the Commission, deprive another form of transportation of traffic which the Commission deemed to be its fair share. We had been so intent upon preserving the so-called inherent advantages of all forms of transportation, that we were depriving the traveling and shipping public of the lower costs which are inherent in clean and vigorous competition.

In the Transportation Act of 1958—for the first time—we faced the fact that there is no transportation monopoly. To some degree we relaxed our previously imposed restrictions. We relieved the Commission of some of the burden of deciding which traffic belonged to which type of carrier and directed that rates should be tested by conditions within the industry seeking to make reductions. We made it clear that when one mode of transportation can reduce its rates and make money in the process, it should be allowed to do so. It was to be relieved of the obligation to keep its rates up and thus charge the public more merely to keep a less efficient mode of transportation in position to get what was considered to be its share of the traffic.

When we review developments in the past 12 months what do we find to be the situation? What has been the effect of our mandates of a year ago? It is my considered opinion that the Transportation Act of 1958 has not accomplished its intended purpose and that the failure cannot be charged off to the relatively short period of time that has elapsed.

An article which was published in the August 24 issue of the Journal of Commerce reported on developments under the 1958 act. The article was written by the Washington bureau of that publication and reflects that careful research had been made as to what has occurred. So that it may be available for the information of Congress, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAIL RELIEF STILL LAGGING UNDER 1958 ACT—STATUTE STAYS TANGLED IN MESH OF OWN WORDS AND ICC PROCEDURES

WASHINGTON.—The Railroad Relief Act of 1958 heads into its second year and an examination of its short lifetime indicates the law is headed for a long infancy.

Of the four major points written into law last year, not one has yet been accepted into the conglomeration of statutes known as transportation law.

Bogged down in the administrative process the relief supposedly accorded railroads in particular, and common carriage in general, is still awaiting weaning from the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC).

FOUR PROVISIONS

Generally, the Transportation Act of 1958 provided:

For the guarantee by the Federal Government of the repayment of $500 million in loans from private sources to needy railroads.

Quicker discontinuance of interstate and intrastate trains and ferries deemed unprofitable.

The regulation by ICC of rates on formerly exempt commodities such as fruits and vegetables and fish.

A new rule of ratemaking by which ICC would determine the reasonableness of rates via a mode of transportation without taking into consideration the effect such rates might have on competitors.

Thus far, there have been these developments:

1. Although Government backing of nearly $65 million in loans has been sought, ICC has approved only $3,934,960 for Federal guarantee.

2. Fifty-three interstate trains have been discontinued and not one intrastate train.

NO RATE ACTION

3. Not one rate has been prescribed by the ICC for the transportation of commodities brought under regulation by the law of August 12, 1959.

4. The new rule of ratemaking appears to be no more than so much additional legal verbiage to add to the already complex term "reasonableness," and may be years in settling.

On the loan provision, the commission has actually approved the guarantee of a loan of $3 million for the Boston & Maine Railroad and a loan of $934,960 for the Georgia & Florida Railroad.

APPLICATIONS PENDING

It has stated terms under which it will approve a loan of $9,889,540 for the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, but the transaction has not yet been concluded.

The Boston & Maine originally asked for ICC approval of a $6 million loan. Pending are applications from the New Haven for an additional $500,000 and from the Georgia & Florida for $1 million. Also, the New York Central has asked for a guarantee for a $40 million loan, the Atlantic & Danville Railroad for $800,000 and the Lehigh Valley for $6 million.

ICC's budget allots around $100,000 for the processing of such applications, an amount which is recoverable from fees assessed against applicants at a rate of three-quarters of 1 percent of the face amount of the loan.

POOR BY COMPARISON

While the number of unprofitable trains that have been discontinued might seem impressive it hardly seems so compared with the number of trains discontinued prior to the 1958 law.

In the 7-year period, 1951–57, the railroads discontinued on an average of 173 trains a year by obtaining appropriate authorizations from State commissions. The high number was 243 trains in 1952 and 117 trains in 1957.

No application for authority to discontinue intrastate trains, which involves a longer hearing process, has been approved by the ICC. Over 25 intrastate trains are involved in pending applications.

The 1958 law also eliminated any doubt as to ICC jurisdiction over the transportation of fresh and frozen fruits and vegetables and other commodities formerly considered exempt.

Rate regulation over such transportation, advocated by the regulated motor carriers as well as by the railroads, was supposed to have the effect of putting the regulated carriers on an even basis with gypsy haulers in obtaining the traffic.

The ICC followed its precedent of not suspending initial rates of carriers and let the gypsy carriers establish any rates they wanted. At the same time, however, the Commission instituted hundreds of investigations into the new rates for the purpose of arriving at reasonableness.

MIGHT TAKE YEARS

At this time, there has not yet been an examiner's report, and the ordinary timetable—examiners' reports, exceptions, Commission decisions, petitions for reconsideration, reconsideration, appeals to courts (most likely), etc.—indicates it might be years before a rate level may be established.

One of the more interesting aspects of the 1958 law is the so-called rule of ratemaking, whereby the Commission is admonished to consider the reasonableness of carrier rates without weighing the effect of such rates on competitive modes of transportation, "giving due consideration to the national transportation policy."

In only one or two cases has ICC had opportunities to view rates where the new ratemaking section was involved. In all instances it has held that the national transportation policy requires that all types of carriers be healthy and that there can be no such vigorous system without considering the adverse effect one carrier's rates might have on another mode.

LOWER RATES APPROVED

But then, in an obscure case last week—one involving reduced motor carrier rates on building materials from Twin Cities, Minn., to points in South Dakota—an ICC division approved the lower rates over the protest of railroads, saying that under the 1958 law, "a carrier is not required to maintain rates on an artificially high level to protect the traffic of another mode of transportation."

The Transportation Act of 1958 reached its first birthday with only a smattering of controversy. There are many more voices to be heard before it reaches the age of legal maturity.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the article states that railroad relief is still lagging under the 1958 act, and that the statute remains tangled in the "mesh of its own words and ICC procedure."

It was our intent that, through the act, the railroads and other carriers should be given greater freedom in adjusting their rates and that the Interstate Commerce Commission was to expedite their consideration. It was thought flexibility in adjustment of rates would bring more business and would result in rehabilitating and revitalizing this industry. Committees of Congress were told that competitive rate adjustments under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission could be the most effective way that railroads could help themselves. We considered this a fair approach because we felt that this legislation would enable all types of carriers to file competitive rate schedules; and, in turn, higher rates would be averted. In this way, the public would be benefited and inflation be dealt a devastating blow.

As we look back over the past year in an attempt to discover what the results have been, we find that the remarkable recovery in our national economy has made it possible for many of our railroads to improve their position simply because there has been more traffic to haul. Because the act does not lend itself to easy interpretation of its provisions, only a few railroads have applied for loans as authorized in the act.

While the railroad industry as a whole, up to the present time, seems to have prospered, we must admit the probability that recovery comes from an improvement in business conditions rather than from legislation. However, in my opinion, the July earnings of the railroads are alarming. They indicate a trend in the wrong direction. The steel strike and other factors have reduced the volume of available traffic. It is clear that if general business conditions level off again the railroads will be back at our doorstep in need of assistance. We will be confronted with the question as to why our act of 1958 has not brought results.

The railroads and their problems are of particular concern to the people of the New England area, including my own State of New Hampshire, while agriculture is important to us we are very dependent upon industry. We realize that the railroads are the backbone of our transportation system and are necessary to economic welfare and growth. They are indispensable to national defense. In my part of the country, we are well aware of the fact that where there is no railroad serving a given community heavy industry is not easily attracted and thus industrial development may be curtailed. We of the New England States, cannot sit idly by and permit the further abandonment of railroad trackage. We believe that it is absolutely necessary that we should, in every manner possible, assist the railroads to help themselves in order to preserve their economy and well-being, not only for the people engaged in the industry, but for the economic welfare of our people and the defense of our country. Whatever additional legislation the Congress deems necessary to help the railroads solve their problems should be enacted.

The railroads, certainly in the eastern part of the country, are in a dire situation. I do not like to think of what could happen if the worse should develop, as it might well develop.

Our American way of life makes possible the principles of free enterprise which are so fundamental to the preservation of business and industry. I think it is about time that we start translating these high-sounding phrases into positive action. We should permit the railroads and other carriers to operate as free enterprises and to exercise the freedom of action and freedom of decision found in other industries. Unless we do so, we are either going to be compelled to spend untold millions of dollars to support them, or face Government ownership—and may God spare us that result. Do the people in any other mode of transportation think for a moment that they could, in such an eventuality, escape the same ultimate fate? It seems to me that all forms of transportation have a direct and common interest in helping to preserve a healthy and prosperous railroad system.

Do not misunderstand my position. I am a vigorous supporter of all forms of public transportation and their problems, as they may arise, are also of great concern to me. Each of them is indispensable to our economy. However, when we look back over the record of the past 25 years we see that all other forms of transportation have multiplied in size and scope and have increased their facilities and equipment many times over. This has been all to the good and I commend the trucking industry, the airlines and the water carriers for the vigorous way in which they have met the challenges of our growing economy. But the railroads, which once were the sole connecting link in industrial America, and which at the turn of the century handled more than 90 percent of the traffic movement, and which only as late as 25 years ago handled 70 percent, have today declined to less than 50 percent of the total. How much lower should this index be permitted to drop?

Because of my concern for the economic plight of the railroads in my part of the country, I have been seeking information, as have many of you, as to how these problems may be solved. I have been intrigued by a relatively new development called piggyback. I believe that here is a technique which might very well be a solution for many of the railroads' problems. I see it as a means for getting trailers from place to place at lower cost and I welcome its promise as a means of reducing highway congestion. I gain a further impression that great savings for the shippers lie ahead in blending together the best features of the various modes of transportation.

This new method is said be rapidly growing and is being generally accepted by the shipping public and the railroads. A recent military report expressed the belief that the use of "piggyback," together with acceptance of uniform standards for containerization, will give us a more adequate transportation system, essential to the needs of warfare in an atomic age.

"Piggyback" may be of material assistance in the improvement in the railroad situation in two ways: First, in some instances, it encourages purchase and ownership of flat cars by shippers thus attracting new capital, and second, it provides a more efficient use for railroad cars. Flat cars may be quickly loaded and unloaded by merely rolling trailers on or off, and eliminating expensive intracity switching. And further, by this method, railroad cars are confined to use in mass movement between terminal points where they are most efficient, while delivery is accomplished by simply rolling the trailers off the flat cars.

Apparently "piggyback" is still in the embryonic stage, but its possibilities appear to be good.

I have explained the new freedom we gave, or intended to give, to all modes of transportation, because all modes of transportation are necessary, in order to be realistic in the reduction of rates as a means of finding the economic level at which each is the most efficient. I have just mentioned this new method of operation where highway trailers or containers may be hauled on flat cars and then quickly pulled over the highway to their ultimate destination. These two new things afford more real promise for the development of a transportation system in keeping with the times than anything else I have been able to discover. This combination of lower rates and better service could spell railroad recovery and make unnecessary Government subsidy to assure their continuous existence in our free enterprise system.

The railroads themselves in the past year by their actions have earned a great deal of credit for improvements they have made and are planning to make to modernize and speed up the efficiency of the railroad system. They have demonstrated an abundant belief in the principle of self-help. They have not stood still. They have introduced many innovations and have been turning more and more to the use of modern electronic devices to supplant outmoded yards and terminals and are also modernizing their accounting procedures.

They have demonstrated the wisdom of rate reduction by revision of their freight rates in order to meet the competition of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Only a short time ago, the eastern railroads reduced the grain freight rates to eastern points and ports, and, in so doing, they immediately commenced to enjoy the support of the grain shippers. In all of these endeavors they should be further encouraged.

This is just a part of the freedom of action that was intended by Congress, and, if we are to keep faith, we must open the door wider if the railroads are to survive and remain a vital part of our transportation system as a private industry, to the end that it will not be necessary for them to abandon any more railroad trackage. They have a duty to expand their service and participate in the business that is available to all methods of transportation on a competitive, economic basis.

In this connection, I should like to commend the recent action of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on which my distinguished junior colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] serves so ably. In response to the mandate of Congress in the Transportation Act of 1958 the Chairman of the Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], recently appointed an advisory council of industry leaders from throughout the country to make a thorough study of the entire transportation field. This study by the Nation's top leaders from industry and labor, and including representatives of the public, with the aid of a highly qualified staff, will endeavor to frame a legislative program to foster the further development of the Nation's transportation system. Such a study should, of course, include not only the railroads, but also the carriers which operate over the highways and airways, on the sea, and on the inland waterway systems.

Also, I note that in his budget message to the Congress for 1960, the President directed the Secretary of Commerce to conduct a similar study—and I quote the order, appearing on page M–46:

> In recent years, the Federal Government has had to take actions to meet emergency problems which have arisen in highways, railways, and aviation. These actions have sometimes been taken on a partial and piecemeal basis, without full consideration of the impact on other transportation programs. The Secretary of Commerce, at my request, is undertaking a comprehensive study of national transportation to identify emerging problems, redefine the appropriate Federal role, and recommend any legislation or administrative actions needed to assure the balanced development of our transportation system.

We should be able to work out a public policy which will aid all segments of transportation and assure the continuation of our traditional, vigorous, free enterprise and competitive transportation complex, with a minimum of public regulation.

I hope these studies will encompass a complete and thorough review of the Transportation Act of 1958. Its objectives, as outlined in the Senate committee's report, should be surveyed, and there should be a determination of the degree to which it has succeeded or has failed of realization. The studies should also encompass a comprehensive review of the tax burden of the railroads, particularly as it may relate to possible inequities in their competitive position.

I think it is extremely important that these studies also include a review of the manner in which the administrative agency has interpreted the congressional mandate and intent and the speed and efficiency with which it has acted. It would be a misconception to infer that this statement by me indicates a lack of confidence on my part in our administrative agencies. Quite the contrary is the case. But I do believe most firmly that their principal duty is to carry out the intent of the Congress, as expressed in the laws Congress has enacted.

Mr. President, by way of conclusion, I should like to point out that the future welfare of the railroads as an integral part of our transportation economy and the continued employment of thousands of railroad workers in that industry cannot be left to stopgap or patch-and-mend measures which might be enacted by the Congress in times of fiscal emergency or national crisis. It is from within the railroad industry itself that strength must come on a continuing basis. Does it not seem reasonable, therefore, that if the railroads have found even a beginning of a workable solution, all parts of the Government should do everything legitimately within their respective spheres of power to foster and encourage them in their endeavors? Most certainly, the Congress and the agencies directly affiliated with the legislative branch have a particular obligation and responsibility to do their respective parts.

I hope this may be the trend of the future, because, in my judgment, it is the wisest and best public policy, and is absolutely essential to an expanding America.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield for a question?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the Senator from New Hampshire on his most thoughtful presentation.

Before I came to Washington, I was a local attorney, and represented three railroads. I remember at that time the extent to which what we might call "trips" were used.

The other day someone said, "The railroads must wake up to the tremendous opportunity which exists for them in America. In Europe, one can buy a railroad ticket that is good for 90 days."

Great numbers of Americans—including myself—have not visited all parts of this country. Does not the Senator from New Hampshire believe it would be well for the railroads to organize what might be called "See America" trips? For that purpose, they could provide sleeping compartments on the trains. Railroad trips could be provided, for instance, across the continent, going west across the northern route, and returning by means of the southern route, and en route stopping at all the worthwhile places; and the railroads could arrange for group trips, with perhaps 100 or more persons in a group. Many suggestions of this sort have been made.

Certainly we need to have in the railroad business those who will realize the opportunities which exist for proper utilization of the fine railroad system we have.

I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire realizes full well, as he has said, that we cannot afford to let our railroad transportation system die, insofar as taking care of the public is concerned.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. In my State, the railroads want to get rid of their passenger service. But if the railroads were to lower the passenger service rates, and were to use less costly equipment, and if they served the public in such ways that many people would want to utilize that service, I am sure the railroads would find that the 3 million Americans who each year are reaching the time when they wish to utilize our transportation systems would wish to use the railroads. So I think the suggestions the Senator from New Hampshire has made will bear good fruit.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for his comments and his suggestions.

If America is to prosper in times of peace, she must have not only adequate railroad transportation, but also adequate truck transportation, adequate air transportation, and adequate ship transportation, both along our coasts and on our navigable rivers. I believe that all elements of service of those types must be maintained.

Today, I have discussed the situation in the railroad transportation industry, because, in particular—as the Senator knows—in my part of the country the railroads are the weakest link in the entire transportation system. In New England and the East there are railroads that are but two steps from bankruptcy. Some of these railroads are in dire financial plight. As a representative of one of the New England States and its people and its industries, we cannot afford to see the railroads fold up.

Furthermore, regardless of what form of transportation one may prefer to use, in case of a great national emergency, it is absolutely essential that the railroads be ready and available. If they are to be ready and available at such times, they must be maintained in healthy condition.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from New Hampshire yield again?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY. As I understand the position of the Senator from New Hampshire, it is that not only the railroads but also the Congress owe the country the obligation of seeing to it that what we might call a railroad clinic is held, to find the necessary answers.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. We cannot find them by means of appropriating money, as we did some time ago.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes. The Transportation Act which Congress passed about a year ago has been acclaimed by many persons. However, it has not accomplished what I hoped it would accomplish for both the Nation and the railroads.

Mr. WILEY. Someone has said that if the Government keeps feeding the people, they do not take the initiative which they should take. I believe that applies both to the railroads and to any others who may be in distress.

Certainly a clinic is needed, to examine the present situation and to seek the remedy.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from New Hampshire, under the limitation in the morning hour, has expired.

THE CIGAR INDUSTRY OF TAMPA, FLA.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, 92 years ago—in the year 1867—Don Ignacio Haya, a native of Spain, founded Cigar Factory No. 1 in Tampa, Fla., and pioneered the movement which has made this progressive Florida city the fine cigar capital of the world, where more all-Havana cigars are made than in the city of Havana itself.

Today, the Tampa cigar industry is comprised of 77 factories which employ approximately 20 percent of the entire labor market of the city and supply its largest industrial payroll.

Of the 4,500 manufacturing workers in the Tampa cigar industry, 3,000 devote their skill to making handmade all-Havana cigars by the careful Spanish method which requires triple the national average time for making a cigar.

Tampa and all Florida are proud of its cigar industry, with which are identified many of our fine old Florida families, generally of Cuban or Spanish origin. The art of Cuban craftsmen who followed the traditional Spanish hand method of rolling and finishing cigars has been handed down from generation to generation, and results in a standard of taste and quality in cigars which has brought this major Florida industry world renown.

On behalf of the Tampa cigar industry, my colleague, Senator SMATHERS, and I invite all Senators who enjoy the pasttime to top off their noon meal today with one of the fine all-Havana cigars which will be passed around the dining rooms, through the courtesy of the cigar manufacturers of Tampa, Fla. These cigars are made from the finest leaf tobacco grown on the island of Cuba, whose principal market is the Tampa factories. We hope that Senators will enjoy these cigars, which we are happy to provide.

RADIO AND TELEVISION COVERAGE OF EISENHOWER TRIP AND THE DAVIS CUP MATCHES

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, there has always been a great deal of criticism of our radio and TV networks to the effect that they have not given adequate coverage or prime network time to newsworthy and topical current events programs. It often disturbs me that those who criticize the networks most often do not take note of those occasions on which the networks do an excellent job in covering either major news items or various events of educational or cultural importance.

I want today to call attention to an excellent editorial in this morning's New York Times which praises the radio and TV industry for their fine coverage of President Eisenhower's triumphal tour of Europe and the Davis Cup tennis matches. On both occasions, the networks allocated prime evening and weekend afternoon time for these events, and, as a result, it was necessary to cancel programs which would have yielded considerable revenue. I commend the radio and TV networks for their fine coverage of these two events.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC SERVICE ON THE AIR

People who have been listening to their radios or watching their television screens these last several days have had the chance to witness some excellent examples of public service by these media. The very full reporting of President Eisenhower's trip abroad, the prompt rebroadcast of the television conversation between the President and Prime Minister Macmillan, and the nearly 5-hour transmission of the Davis Cup matches last Sunday were outstanding examples. At times the broadcasters have canceled sponsored shows to provide time for these public service broadcasts, at consequent financial sacrifice to themselves. Such enterprise and effective concern for the public interest deserve recognition.

STATES' RIGHTS TO TAX INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we recall that, following the Supreme Court's decision relating to the rights of States to tax firms dealing in interstate commerce, there has been a great deal of concern among firms throughout the country regarding the impact which the Court's decision would have on their businesses.

Fortunately, both the Senate and the House of Representatives have now passed bills aimed toward clarifying the situation and helping to eliminate some of the problems—as well as to make a study of the overall situation. As we know, the bill is now in conference.

The conferees—I would hope—will find it possible to reach an early agreement on the different versions of this legislation. Certainly this should be one of the pieces of legislation finally approved during this session of the Congress. Although the measure will not solve all the problems, it is a step in the right direction.

To bring to the attention of the conferees the deep concern of a number of our businessmen in this matter, I request unanimous consent to have a number of theses messages printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the messages were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 31, 1959.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We know from your careful interest in the business community of your State that you are fully familiar with the problems in taxation of interstate business which have been generated by the Supreme Court cases of this spring on the subject. Principally, these cases are the Stockham Valve Case, the Northwest Portland Cement case, the Browne-Foreman case, and the International Shoe case.

I know you can appreciate that the taxation of profits based on the point of destination of sales will create an enormous paperwork burden on companies such as our own. It will likewise tend to expose company profits to multiple taxation since it is exceedingly unlikely that the States taxing on the point of origin basis will change their positions. Finally, a point of destination basis for taxation will inevitably work an inequity on some businesses whose presence in the State is known by the taxing officials as against equally strong companies whose presence in such State is not known.

Accordingly, we wish to add our strong endorsement to what, in all fairness, seems to be required; namely, congressional action discouraging income taxation based on sales in States of destination unless there is some other substantial activity besides mere solicitation of orders occurring in such State.

Very truly yours.

AUGUST 31, 1959.
The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The Swiss Colony is a member of the U.S. small business. It is a mail order concern with national distribution but only one office. That office is located in the city of Monroe, State of Wisconsin.

We have been following with interest recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions regarding the taxability of an enterprise such as ours by the various States of the Union.

You undoubtedly realize the impact it would have on us if we had to calculate, segregate, and allocate our income and expenses among the 50 States of the Union in order to determine the proper tax to be paid to each of them.

The cost of clerical and accounting work involved alone would eliminate us from competition—the taxes we would have to pay would definitely underline the elimination.

These recent powers uncovered for the taxing authorities of the States are so wide that details to prove the effect they would have on us and upon our fellow small businesses are almost unnecessary. We will, however, be very happy to submit details to you.

We ask your consideration. We strongly urge that you fully study—as various news and tax reports indicate you are already doing—this potential monster.

At the same time we sincerely thank you for everything you have done and will be doing for us in this respect as well as that of other noteworthy legislation.

Best wishes.

Cordially, ——— ———.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., August 25, 1959.
The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We have written you before requesting your assistance in providing legislation to prevent State taxation of income derived from interstate commerce.

We understand that the House and Senate are now considering this legislation under a bill entitled House Joint Resolution 450 in the House and S. 2524 in the Senate.

We are requesting you as our representative in the Senate to support these bills.

Yours very truly,

——— ———.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Recently the Supreme Court made a decision (Stockham Valves-Northwestern Cement) that if not corrected by effective legislation will be disastrous to many small and medium sized companies doing business in more than one State.

I am speaking, of course, about the power of States to tax companies on what would normally be considered interstate commerce. Such taxes may now be imposed against a company which merely has advertised or sent a salesman into the State. Many States are currently rushing legislation through to take advantage of this decision.

I strongly urge you to support legislation such as S. 2524 with the following minimum provisions:

1. Prohibit States from taxing the income from interstate commerce unless the taxpayer has a place of business within the State.

2. Prescribe a uniform allocation formula for apportioning such income.

3. Prevent the States from collecting taxes retroactively based on the new Supreme Court interpretation.

Effective action must be taken on this before adjournment, as further delay may be disastrous to Wisconsin businessmen engaged in interstate commerce.

Very truly yours, D. R. AXTELL.

APPLETON, WIS., August 27, 1959.
Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I am quite concerned because of the Supreme Court decision relative to the right of States to assess income taxes on a manufacturer who ships in interstate commerce.

The paperwork and tax accountant expense will be terrific. In other words, according to the decision, we would be required to file income tax returns in every State in the Union. We now file only in Wisconsin and California because we have warehouses in California. What the Supreme Court decision amounts to is that each State will require what amounts to a duty as if we were shipping into a foreign country.

I feel that legislation should be provided at once to avoid the chaos and confusion this decision will cause in interstate commerce.

Please give us a reply as to your views on this very important matter.

Very truly yours,

SEYMOUR GMEINER.

MANITOWOC, WIS., August 27, 1959.
Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We wish to urge you to support the bills which are now in Congress which would prevent the various States from taxing corporations on interstate commerce. Under the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in two related cases, one involving Georgia taxes and the other involving Minnesota taxes (Northwestern States Portland Cement Company v. Minnesota and Williams v. Stockham Valves and Fittings, Incorporated, 358 U.S. 50), the Supreme Court gave the various States power to tax that portion of interstate commerce carried on in their State by companies located outside the State.

This power given to the States will have the effect of restricting interstate commerce very drastically and will throw a tremendous amount of detailed work on the various companies doing interstate business, as well as resulting in duplicate taxation on income.

We urge you to take every measure to correct this very serious situation. May we have an expression from you as to your decision in this matter?

Awaiting your reply, we are,

Sincerely yours.

WAUKESHA, WIS., August 31, 1959.
Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Those who have been concerned over the recent Supreme Court decisions (Northwestern Cement–Stockham Valves) were pleased with the prompt action taken by both the House and Senate in the passage of corrective legislation. However, since the bills differ in certain important respects, I assume that these must be settled in conference.

The following are my comments on the most important of these differences:

1. The final legislation should bar assessment of back taxes as was done in the Senate bill (S. 2524). If this is not done, States would assess such taxes retroactively to the first year their income tax law was in effect (with interest). This could result in severe hardship particularly for small or medium sized companies doing business in interstate commerce.

2. The final legislation should cover all taxes on interstate commerce, as was done in the House bill (H.J. Res. 450).

Very truly yours.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to speak on another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator desires to speak on another subject.

Mr. WILEY. I am going to look at the clock now, Mr. President, to make sure that my dear friend from Illinois is not wrong. It is possible he could be wrong, as he has been on the whole issue regarding diversion of water from Lake Michigan.

Mr. President, I desire now to speak on another subject for 3 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry? How many more speeches does the Senator from Wisconsin have up his sleeve in an effort to continue his filibuster?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, without taking time from my 3 minutes, I want to say, if the distinguished Senator will recognize that this is the morning hour and that the purpose of the morning hour is to get into the RECORD matters which pertain particularly to vital issues in the country, later on we shall have something to say on the question of filibustering.

If the Senator has read the editorial published in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald, he knows that the newspaper really took him for a little ride by indirection, because he is the one who has been shouting "filibuster."

I must say, the Senator does not distinguish between what is an argument on the issues and what relates to something collateral thereto. That is what determines a filibuster.

I must say, the Senator is a genius in filibustering himself, as the RECORD shows, since the Senator has held the floor for weeks and months at a time. He is the last one in the world who should attempt to criticize a Senator who is trying to give out a little information to the public on subjects which relate not to the issue before the Senate, in the morning hour.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

NEEDED ACTION ON THE NATIONAL HIGHWAY PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in Wisconsin and across the Nation, the national highway program is facing serious curtailment. Why?

Because the Congress has failed to act to provide the financing.

We recall that the President, again and again, has urged action by Congress to provide additional funds for improvement and expansion of our Nation's highways.

In the interest of the economy, I believe we can no longer afford to delay this vital program. Fortunately, the bill in the House has now been reported by the Public Works Committee, and, as I understand it, is to be brought before the Rules Committee this morning.

Recently, I have received—as I am sure have other Senators—messages from individuals, businesses, and from county and State highway commissions stressing the difficulties and adverse economic repercussions caused by the "slowdown" of the highway construction program. Reflecting the need for expeditious action, I request unanimous consent to have a number of these communications printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREMPEALEAU COUNTY
HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT,
Whitehall, Wis., August 17, 1959.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The undersigned highway committee of the Trempealeau County Board of Supervisors wishes to bring to your attention the sincere desire of this committee that the Congress insure the continuation of the Federal highway construction program by the appropriation of sufficient funds through increased gasoline taxes, or such other measure as may be deemed appropriate.

Your committee is confident that it is expressing the will of the citizens of Trempealeau County in stating that the present Federal highway construction program is vital to the interests of this area and that to restrict or delay that program is not only to jeopardize the defense of our Nation, but will result in needless disruption of the local economy and serious interference with the projected highway maintenance and construction program of Trempealeau County as well.

We wish to respectfully urge that your office and influence be utilized to effect the adoption by the Congress of legislation that will provide the necessary funds by the United States to permit the various States to immediately resume their respective highway construction and maintenance programs, which programs are so vitally dependent upon the disposition of Congress.

Please permit us to extend in advance our appreciation for your efforts in behalf of this program and our gratitude for your effective representation of the interests of the people of Trempealeau County before the Congress in the past.

Very sincerely,

RUSSELL PAULSON,
JAMES STEEN,
IRWIN A. HOGDEN,
Trempealeau County Highway Committee.

BLACK RIVER FALLS, WIS.,

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WILEY: The undersigned highway committee of the Jackson County Board of Supervisors wish to bring to your attention the sincere desire of this committee that the Congress insure the continuation of the Federal highway construction program by the appropriation of sufficient funds through increased gasoline taxes, or such other measure as may be deemed appropriate.

Your committee is confident that it is expressing the will of the citizens of Jackson County in stating that the present Federal highway construction program is vital to the interests of this area and that to restrict or delay that program is not only to jeopardize the defense of our Nation, but will result in needless disruption of the local economy and serious interference with the projected highway maintenance and constructon program of Jackson County as well.

We wish to respectfully urge that your office and influence be utilized to effect the adoption by the Congress of legislation that will provide the necessary funds by the United States to permit the various States to immediately resume their respective highway construction and maintenance programs, which programs are so vitally dependent upon the disposition of Congress.

Please permit us to extend in advance our appreciation for your efforts in behalf of this program and our gratitude for your effective representation of the interests of the people of Jackson County before the Congress in the past.

Very sincerely,

WALTER HART,
EDWIN PETERSON,
WM. J. HARKNER,
Jackson County Highway Committee.

The Honorable ALEXANDER J. WILEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: May we please call your attention to the possibility of disruption of the economy of a sizable segment of industries in the State of Wisconsin which will result from enforcement of the recently passed 1960 Department of Commerce General Appropriations Act.

It is the writer's understanding that prior to the passage of this act the Bureau of Public Roads had access to moneys from the general fund for financing their projects, when necessary. The discontinuation of the availability of these moneys apparently puts the State highway commission in a position where instead of being able to obtain their reimbursement for work done within approximately 90 days it will make it necessary for them to wait approximately 8 to 10 months for payment. As a result they have apparently been forced to curtail the program which they had planned for the State.

We here in the State, who have geared ourselves to the anticipated large-scale national program of roadbuilding, will find it very embarrassing as it will force cutbacks in employment, which will finally affect the entire economy of the State if some immediate remedy is not found.

I am appealing to you in your position in the U.S. Congress to do all possible to correct this situation immediately, by whatever action is necessary.

Sincerely yours.

AUGUST 10, 1959.

Subject: Federal aid highway bill.
Senator A. WILEY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Please be advised that the failure of the Federal Government to continue the highway program has affected us most seriously inasmuch as we are subcontractors on many road jobs.

We therefore would appreciate very much if you would do everything within your power to see that the Government aids the highway program and continues it at as rapid a pace as possible.

Yours very truly,

THE PATENT SCAFFOLDING CO.
OF WISCONSIN.

AUGUST 18, 1959.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The purpose of this letter is to call your attention to the fact that the Federal highway program is proceeding faster, according to my observations, than the actual need for the highways happens to be.

Consequently, this program can very well be delayed as much as 2 years without it hurting anybody at all because the need for the highways as per the program is in excess of requirements.

Another thing, it is pretty generally recognized that a tax, once imposed, is never repealed. I feel that after we pay an additional 1-cent gasoline tax for a given period of years that it will become a matter-of-fact thing, and we will go on paying it for the rest of our lives.

I sincerely hope that you will fight this measure to a successful finish because it does not deserve your support in my humble opinion.

Sincerely yours.

BRILLION, WIS., August 21, 1959.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am certain you realize by the nature of our business that we are, both directly and indirectly, involved in the national roadbuilding program. Directly, by supplying construction type castings, such as manholes and catch basin castings, etc., to the roadbuilder. Indirectly, by supplying rough gray iron castings to the manufacturers of heavy roadbuilding equipment.

Therefore, if we are to maintain steady employment and solid growth it is imperative that the roadbuilding program continue at a steady pace. I am also certain you are well acquainted with the additional losses in American lives delay in the national roadbuilding program will entail.

I am also of the opinion that the pay-as-you-go plan, as it was originally laid out, is by far the best. If an increase in the gas tax presents itself as an equitable solution to the program's continuance I do not believe we have any alternative but to adopt this means of financing.

It is quite apparent that something must be done soon, which is the reason for this letter. I am sure you will do the best thing for all parties involved.

I would appreciate being kept up to date on your progress.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Very truly yours,

BRILLION IRON WORKS, INC.,
NEALE H. CAFLISCH.

AUGUST 5, 1959.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The recent news concerning Federal aid for our Wisconsin highway program in 1961 and 1962 is certainly tragic, to say the least. We all know our need for better highways, as well as the employment this aid provides.

Your support of any legislation involving this aid to our highway program cannot be overemphasized.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM KLEMMER.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., August 26, 1959.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The crisis that has developed in our interstate road building program through lack of funds is a threat to the welfare of our Nation. I believe our legislators must take immediate steps to insure the needed funds to continue this program without interruption as envisioned in the Highway Act of 1956.

The cost of a cutback at this time would be tremendous through the loss of continuity in engineering, manpower and etc., which has all been geared to a continuous operation. Manufacturers as well have equipped their organizations with necessary personnel, facilities and tools to insure that anticipated demands for their products would and could be met. Thousands of our citizens are also dependent on the uninterrupted continuation of this program for their livelihood.

In the vicinity of our larger metropolitan areas, local construction has been planned to work into the Interstate System in bypassing congested areas with construction already started. A holdup at this time would create worse traffic jams than anyone can possibly envision.

The present and increasing death rate of our citizens on antiquated highways with only 68 million vehicles at the present time will mount rapidly with the anticipated 100 million vehicles on our roads by 1975. Our road program must continue to help curb this death rate. It has been estimated that 4,000 lives yearly can be saved by the Interstate System.

The above figures alone make the cost of this program a secondary item. However, it is highly recommended that Federal financing be managed on a businesslike or "pay-as-you-go basis." Deficit financing of any type would not only increase the national debt but would add to the ultimate cost of the program. With this in mind I strongly urge your support in affecting legislation to continue the interstate highway program on an uninterrupted basis by increasing the present gasoline tax to pay for this program.

Very truly yours.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on a subject which relates to the point at issue——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is this a continuation of the filibuster?

Mr. WILEY. Again I say, all the Senator knows is the word "filibuster." That is very apparent. The Senator keeps pointing to a filibuster—filibuster—filibuster. As I say, if the Senator will read the morning newspaper, he will find it really takes the distinguished Senator for a ride, by indirection, because he is the one who has been shouting to high heaven, "filibuster."

This is not a filibuster.

Mr. President, in pointing out the dangers of this bill H.R. 1, we are attempting to show that the measure would, first, be against domestic interests; and, second, threaten our relations with our good neighbor, Canada.

However, the enactment of the ill-advised bill would also create dangerous, far-reaching repercussions—adverse to U.S. interests—around the globe.

Historically, the United States has an honored reputation for living up to and carrying out in letter and spirit our agreements with other nations.

The proposed legislation before us threatens to negate that history; to destroy our reputation for integrity, honesty, dependability, and good faith in international negotiations.

How?

Let us look at a few ways by which it could adversely affect us:

First of all, the evidence presented to the Senate—in the form of views by the Canadian Government—are overwhelming proof that the pending legislation—if enacted—would be a definite violation of both the spirit and the letter of agreements with that friendly country.

Now, the proponents of this bill are proposing that, first, we ignore the protest of Canada; and, second, that we refuse to live up to the Boundary Water Treaty of 1909 and the Niagara Treaty of 1950.

We must ask ourselves such soul-searching questions as, What would this do to us in the eyes of the world?

First. What would this mean to America—for the reputation, dignity, and stature of the United States—if we deliberately and flagrantly take actions that violate the spirit and the letter of such international agreements?

Second. President Eisenhower is now traveling abroad—to further cement understanding and agreements with Great Britain, Germany, and France.

What would the enactment of treaty-breaking legislation by the U.S. Congress do to his attempts to reach agreement?

In effect, it would seriously handicap, or contribute to destroy the purpose—and hope for success—of the President's mission.

Third. What would such actions do to future negotiations for peace treaties, economic agreements, or any other negotiations between ourselves and other countries?

Just this: The confidence of the nations of the world in our willingness to live up to treaties and agreements would be seriously undermined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILEY. I ask unanimous consent that I have 3 minutes more, and then I will cease speaking during the morning hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

DIVERSION OF WATER FROM LAKE MICHIGAN, AT CHICAGO

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1) to require a study to be conducted of the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway for navigation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] to the first committee, amendment, striking out on page 3, lines 22 and 23, the words "one hundred and seventy-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one hundred and eighty-five".

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. I assume now we are not operating under the 3-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The morning hour has been concluded.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are now considering amendments to H.R. 1.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the exchanges the other day on the Senate floor, I think between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], it was developed that there should not have been a vote to table the motion to send the bill to the Foreign Relations Committee until there had been a complete discussion of the issues.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that we have reached a very fine conclusion. I must say that while the Senate is busy in its committee work and Senators do not show up on the floor because they are busy with other activities, there is evidence that the real issue is permeating the minds and the consciousness of the men who will have to make a decision on the issues.

Because yesterday there were only two or three of us on the floor when the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] gave such a very fine exposition of the angle I shall discuss, and the other issues, I still have the fortitude to bring before the Senate some of the ideas which I have caused to be put into a brief which was circulated among the Senators some days previously, but which apparently a good many of the Senators have not, even up to the present time, found time to read.

I have just sent to my office for a copy of the brief which was previously circulated. I ask that they be placed on the desks of Senators, in the hope that they will have the opportunity at least to examine the appendix to the brief, which I shall discuss in the near future. It sets forth not only the position of the Canadian Government and the present Premier, but also the position of his predecessor, and of a very prominent member of the Canadian Parliament.

Another thing I shall do is to repeat, in substance, a few of the ideas I mentioned on the floor of the Senate the other day. Among other things, I said that in my 20 years' service it was my great privilege to become acquainted with men of judgment, men of reason, men who think things through. I made the statement that when Senator Vandenberg, who occupied a seat not far from mine, would rise to speak, in order that his remarks might be in continuity, he would ask not to be interrupted. I am making that request now, because in the time I shall consume I trust I shall set forth succinctly my own views on the subject.

The other day I mentioned the fact that during this debate I have had two surprises. Very little attention was paid to my statement. First, I found that a number of Senators had not acquainted themselves with the issue, but had given their pledged word to vote in a certain way.

The other day I set forth on the floor of the Senate the fact that there were three bills. The first bill was in the House, and it was disposed of last year. It was a different bill entirely from the one reported from the committee.

The bill which was introduced in the Senate is a different bill from the bill which came from the committee. The committee appended to the House bill two amendments which made it an entirely different measure. I placed those three bills in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. No. I do not wish to yield now. I ask to be permitted to continue my speech without interruption. When I am through I shall be very happy to yield, and be catechized by the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I want the RECORD to be in such shape that those who read can understand my position which I trust will be logical and informative.

I never question the integrity of a fellow Senator. We all have different backgrounds. The things that count more than anything else are the religious background, the educational background, the economic background, but, more than anything else, the geographical background. We strive to serve the interests of our section.

But the big issue involved in this case has no such application, because we are all Americans. When a Senator tells me—as several have—that he has given his pledge to Representative O'BRIEN to support his bill, I call attention to the fact that the bill which came from the Senate committee is entirely different. It is not the O'Brien bill. It is entirely different from the O'Brien bill of 1957, which was the one which some Senators, while they were Members of the House, had occasion to see. It is not the same bill as the Douglas bill or the O'Brien bill of 1958.

I remember when I occupied another seat in the Senate, when I first came here. I remember a very distinguished Senator from Illinois. His name was Lewis. He was a Lord Chesterfield, both in manner and dress. He came over to my seat, and was very friendly. I, of course, being a neophyte, appreciated the wisdom of an older man.

What did he say? Among other things he said, "I never commit myself to a vote in a certain direction on any bill until the measure is in front of me."

"Why?" I asked. I listened to his reply. He said, "You introduce a bill in the Senate. It goes to a committee. The committee operates on it. Then the bill comes back to the Senate, and the Senate operates on it, with amendments. Then it goes to the House, and when it reaches the House it goes through the same committee process. Then the bill may go to conference, and it comes back again after the conferees have acted."

We have an example of that at the present time. There is now in progress a conference on a labor reform bill. What will the result be? I do not know. No other Senator knows. The work of the labor bill conferees will be the result of compromise.

I remember hearing the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] say on the floor of the Senate, "Now that my bill has been amended, I must vote against it."

Following out the advice given to me by the distinguished Senator Lewis of Illinois, I can say that I have never given a firm commitment with respect to any bill, because, as may well happen in connection with the labor reform bill, there may be things in the bill which I oppose, as well as things which I favor. Yet I must vote one way or the other.

As I said the other day, the reason I am going into this subject is that I think I owe an obligation to younger Senators, just as Senator Lewis, of Illinois, felt that he owed me an obligation.

I had a background that also educated me. The idea of making commitments in respect of something that has not even been born does not make sense to me.

I remember a statement made by a prominent labor leader in the State of Wisconsin. Within the past 60 days he attended a luncheon in Washington at which I was present. He said, "I do not agree with Senator WILEY on many things, but no one has a rope around his neck."

I remember very well that during my last campaign one of the kingmakers, when asked whether he intended to support me, said, "Hell, no."

"Why? Isn't he honest?"

He replied, "Yes; he is honest."

"But what is the trouble?"

"He does not take orders."

That is why I can sleep well at night. Of course I disappoint people. Everyone is disappointed at times. Nevertheless, all I want is that when I shuffle off, it can be said of me, "He was his own boss. He was honest. His only boss was his Maker."

What application does that have to the bill before us? When the kingmaker back in my State—and his remark reached me—said, "The old s.o.b."—commenting on me—"does not obey orders," it was the best compliment I ever got.

When the man, the head of one of the fine, clean unions, made this other statement, I felt that labor and management at least had sized me up. So I am not bothered. Nobody tells me what to do.

I spoke yesterday with a fine member of a labor union. He started the conversation by saying, "You know, the Kennedy amendment," and so forth.

I said, "I don't know anything about it, and I don't think you do either. In other words, there has not been an agreement among the conferees."

He smiled and let it go at that. It did not take any time. We had no difference. I simply carried on.

Mr. President, I wish to follow through with the ideas contained in the brief which is on the desks of Senators. I call attention to the fact that annexed to the brief is a very interesting document. I hope Senators will take it and "pick at it," because to me it raises a big issue. For instance, it opens with this statement by Canadian Prime Minister Diefenbaker in the House of Commons on April 16, 1959:

Mr. Speaker, on April 8, 1959, the honorable member for Rosedale asked:

"Would the Prime Minister tell us the attitude of the Canadian Government toward the legislation recently passed in the U.S. House of Representatives in regard to the diversion of water from the Great Lakes at Chicago?"

I replied, after dealing with one or two matters of history, and said:

"We are paying the closest attention to this matter, at the same time not wishing to do anything that would in any way cause a situation to arise which might not be beneficial."

I now wish to bring the House up to date on this subject. When I last spoke on April 8 I stated what the fact was, that the Government was giving careful consideration, and since then has given further consideration to the most effective manner of making known Canada's opposition to the bill which, as I said a moment ago, has passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate Committee on Public Works.

Mr. President, the Prime Minister of Canada was giving careful consideration to the most effective manner of presenting Canada's opposition to the bill in the U.S. Congress. He said, further:

A note registering the reasons for Canada's objection was delivered on April 9, and with the leave of the House I ask permission to table it so that it might possibly appear in Votes and Proceedings. I am not going to read the entire note, but just two particular paragraphs thereof to indicate the general tenor and attitude of the Government in this regard. In the third paragraph the following appears.

I carry on with the Prime Minister quoting from the note:

Every diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreases the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes. The Government of Canada is opposed to any action which will have the effect of reducing the volume of water in the Great Lakes Basin. Careful inquiry has failed to reveal any sources of water in Canada which could be added to the present supplies of the basin to compensate for further withdrawals in the United States. The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago and directs attention to provision of two treaties in particular.

Let me digress from that matter just a moment. Is this something new? We will find out as we read the note that is is not.

Charles Evans Hughes, when he was the special master, spoke on this subject and said, in substance, that if the additional 1,000 cubic feet were granted, the total diversion would be 4,100 cubic feet; or following the Hughes analogy, 6 inches for 8,500 cubic feet, and 3 inches for 4,100 cubic feet.

I continue with the statement of Prime Minister Diefenbaker:

The first is the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 and the second is the Niagara Treaty of 1950.

The general summation of the attitude of the Government in this regard is contained in the last two pertinent paragraphs:

"Because of the importance attached by the United States and Canada to the honoring of international undertakings in letter and in spirit, the Government of Canada views with serious concern any possible impairment of agreements and undertakings relating to the Great Lakes Basin. Furthermore, the alarms created by repeated proposals for diversion which inevitably disturb the people and industry of Canada are a source of profound irritation to the relations between our two countries which we can ill afford."

Oh, Mr. President, as I heard the President of the United States last night, sitting close to British Prime Minister Macmillan, giving his views, and speaking about our relationship with Canada for 140 years, it thrilled me to hear him say that along the 3,000 miles of boundary there are no fortifications, no battle wagons, but simply friendship—enduring friendship. When I consider that happy situation, and when I read this document in my hand, I am sensible of the fact that we Senators must not attempt to "pass the buck" to the President of the United States.

Of course, some have suggested that the President will veto the bill. But no Senator should attempt to rely upon that procedure. Each Senator should tend properly to his own business.

I read further from the proceedings in the Canadian House of Commons and—in this instance—the Canadian note to the United States:

I am instructed, therefore, to express the hope—

Mr. President, I emphasize the words "the hope"— of the Government of Canada that the United States of America will view this matter with equal concern and will be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action will not be taken which would imperil the present regime of the waters in the Great Lakes Basin and the status of the agreements and understandings to which I have referred.

I read further from the proceedings in the Canadian House of Commons:

Mr. SPEAKER. Would the Prime Minister perhaps modify his request so the letter will be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the House agreeable to having this document printed as an appendix to Hansard today?

SOME HONORABLE MEMBERS. Agreed.

Mr. President, could anything have been more impressive than that statement by the Prime Minister of our sister nation?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me, to permit me to make an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina wishes to make an insertion in the RECORD at this time, let me state that I have no objection to yielding for that purpose and to accommodating him in that way, if there is no objection, because—although my remarks will be relatively brief—after he makes the insertion he has in mind, I shall be glad to resume.

So I am ready to accommodate my friend, on the condition that when he concludes his statement, my subsequent remarks will be printed in the RECORD in sequence with the remarks I have already made today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say it is obvious that we are being faced with a filibuster led by the two Senators from Wisconsin.

I have taken the position that they must bear the responsibility for the filibuster, and that the Senate rules should be strictly enforced.

The rule provides that a Senator can yield only for a question; and that if he yields for any purpose other than a question, he loses his right to the floor.

I have a very high opinion of my colleague, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], and I should like to cooperate in obliging him. But in the interest of orderly procedure in the Senate, and because of my desire to have the Senate get on with its business, and to make it as difficult as possible for my friends from Wisconsin to carry on their filibuster, I must, although most reluctantly, object. I hope the Senator from South Carolina realizes why I do so.

I hope that later a way may be cleared to enable the Senator from South Carolina to insert in the RECORD the matter he has in mind. But I cannot accommodate him at the expense of the just claims of the city of Chicago and the people of that part of the country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, under those circumstances, I must continue my remarks.

I am sure the Senator from Illinois is repeating his old stunt of filibustering; and he is doing a pretty good job of using time by objecting whenever he can.

I must state that if he will have someone examine the RECORD and ascertain the time that has been consumed by other Senators, he will find that we who oppose his nefarious scheme have not been filibustering. One who filibusters does not talk to the point. One who filibusters talks on anything but the point.

Mr. President, in resuming my remarks, let me state that I believe I had pointed out that the first note was printed in its entirety in Hansard for the Canadian House of Commons—in other words, in the equivalent of our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The note was printed in the appendix to Hansard. I hold that insertion in my hand.

I was saying that not only did the Prime Minister of Canada express the hope that our country would view this matter with equal concern and would be able to give satisfactory assurances that unilateral action would not be taken, but he also expressed the hope that the United States would carry out her treaty obligations and agreements.

Mr. President, when I was at the United Natons, I became very well acquainted with the Honorable L. B. Pearson, then the Prime Minister of Canada. Today, he is the leader of the opposition in the Canadian House of Commons, at Ottawa. Let me read now what Mr. Pearson said in the course of that debate in the House of Commons:

However, the note has been presented, and I hope it will have the effect it should have in preventing the United States from taking action which would be a breach of treaty arrangements between the two countries.

Well, well, well, Mr. President; there we have it. So there is unity in Canada on this subject; there is no question about that.

Mr. President, I read further from the debates in the Canadian House of Commons:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West). Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I want to say that we are extremely pleased to hear the statement of the Prime Minister with respect to this latest note. We are also pleased to note that it is in stronger terms than any previous note.

Mr. President, I emphasize the words "in stronger terms than any previous note."

I read further from the debate in the Canadian House of Commons:

We support the Government in any effort it may take to protect Canadian interests. We in this group hope that the Congress of the United States will pay attention to this day's proceedings and note from the proceedings that Parliament in this respect is unanimous.

Mr. President, under these circumstances I cannot understand why anyone would fail to understand the chief issue.

Someone has said that five or six States are against Illinois. However, the opposition is not to Illinois, but is only to Chicago and the Chicago district.

As Senators will learn, time and time again the Chicago district has failed to comply with the directions of the Supreme Court, and has exercised almost mandatory power, at times, despite the directions of the Supreme Court. When the Chicago district could not move the Court to do what it wished, Chicago has attempted to persuade the Congress of the United States to take action in the case.

Let us understand clearly what the situation is. As stated yesterday, back in 1930, the Supreme Court made its findings and its decisions, and provided then what amount of water Chicago would be allowed to take out of Lake Michigan and what should be done.

Thereafter, following that direction by the Supreme Court, Chicago developed one of the finest sanitary systems in the world, and that system did a good job. But about 5 years ago, Chicago began to add to her then area of approximately 120 square miles, and increased it, up to the present time, to between 500 and 600 square miles.

Of course, Mr. President, if an automobile or any other piece of machinery that is capable of doing a good job is suddenly asked to do 200 times what it was designed to do, there can be no doubt about what will happen.

So then it was that Chicago applied to the Supreme Court; and the Court allowed temporary relief, and suggested that Chicago clean up her own mess. But Chicago has not done so.

Chicago now has a case before the Supreme Court, which has appointed a special master to find the facts in the situation.

According to the history of this matter which we shall relate, that has happened time and time again. Time and time again, Chicago has obtained temporary relief, which was granted by the Supreme Court with the idea that Chicago would do the necessary job, by building an efficient sewage disposal plant sufficient to take care of the increased amounts of sewage. Of course, as Chicago has so greatly increased in area, the amount of sewage which must be treated has likewise greatly increased in volume. But they just sat pretty, and did not comply with the direction of the Court.

Now, Mr. President, listen to this last sentence again, in which Mr. Herridge said:

We in this group hope that the Congress of the United States will pay attention to this day's proceedings and note from the proceedings that parliament in this respect is unanimous.

Mr. President, you remember what happened. After the bill had gone to the Public Works Committee of the Senate, the Prime Minister sent this note. I read only two sections of it, but I am going to read the rest of it. I want this record to be so clear that those who read and want to understand can see the issue. We have here the opposition of a united Canadian group in the government. Let us say we have the opposition of the Government of Canada, as expressed by Prime Minister Diefenbaker, the previous Prime Minister, L. B. Pearson, and by the representative of a group on the floor of Parliament, the Honorable H. W. Herridge.

It is so plain what the attitude was that there is a general assumption by lawyers that with this note the matter should have been presented in the first instance to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Let us get it straight. This note, which I shall now read, was presented first after the bill went to the Public Works Committee. The date was about 3 weeks after the bill went to the Public Works Committee. Then it was that the note was presented to the Secretary of State.

The note reads:

SIR: I have the honor on instructions from my Government to refer to proposals for legislation in the United States of America concerning an increase in the diversion of water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago drainage canal. It is noted that one proposal to this effect has been approved by the House of Representatives and will shortly be considered by the Senate. During a period of many years there have been numerous occasions on which the Government of Canada has made representations to the Government of the United States of America with respect to proposals concerning the diversion of water from Lake Michigan out of the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago.

Many of these representations have been directed toward particular proposals then under discussion by United States of America authorities. Because of the importance of the question, the Government of Canada believes it timely to reexamine the considerations which it regards as most important concerning any proposals for additional diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed. Accordingly, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the views of the Government of Canada, I have been instructed to bring the following considerations to your attention.

Then follows this paragraph:

Every diversion of water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago inevitably decreases the volume of water remaining in the basin for all purposes. The Government of Canada is opposed to any action which will have the effect of reducing the volume of water in the Great Lakes Basin. Careful inquiry has failed to reveal any sources of water in Canada which could be added to the present supplies of the basin to compensate for further withdrawals in the United States of America. The Government of Canada considers that many agreements and understandings between the United States of America and Canada would be broken if unilateral action were taken to divert additional water from the Great Lakes watershed at Chicago and directs attention to provisions of two treaties in particular.

Mr. President, I think this is very important. The Prime Minister of Canada did not just generalize. The Prime Minister of Canada particularized. He put his finger on the spot. He called to the attention of our Government—your Government and mine—the particular treaties that would be violated. The first is—and I am reading from the note:

(a) The Boundary Water Treaty, 1909: The applicability of either article II, paragraph 2 or article III of this treaty depends upon the interpretation of physical facts.

If Lake Michigan physically flows into the boundary water of Lake Huron, article II preserves to Canada the right to object to such a diversion which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests in Canadian waters.

If, as has been asserted by eminent U.S.A. jurists, article III of the treaty applies, no further diversion shall be made except with the approval of the International Joint Commission.

(b) Niagara Treaty, 1950: This treaty allocates water for scenic and power purposes. The amount of water which shall be available for these purposes is the total outflow from Lake Erie. The specific inclusion of certain added waters in article III of the treaty emphasizes the underlying assumption that existing supplies will continue unabated. In addition to these treaty provisions, there is a further agreement of far-reaching importance. Power development in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec is predicated upon agreed criteria for regulation of the flows of the St. Lawrence River. The order of approval of the International Joint Commission of October 29, 1952, as supplemented on July 2, 1956, and accepted by both our Governments, forms the basis for the construction and operation of the hydroelectric power installations in the international section of the St. Lawrence River. Criterion (a) of this order of approval assumes a continuous diversion out of the Great Lakes Basin limited to the present 3,100 cubic feet per second at Chicago.

There we have it. The order assumes that 3,100 cubic feet per second at Chicago shall be the basis of how we shall carry on in relation to the water supply in Lake Michigan.

Yes, Mr. President, we can set a great precedent of treatybreaking. I shall talk about that in the not too distant future. We can talk about the effects of breaking faith with the best friend we have in the world. There are none better than the common people of Canada, who have done a tremendous job, as anyone who travels through Canada can see. We can create, as has been suggested in the note, further misunderstanding.

We know what is meant when it is said, "In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the views of the Government of Canada." That is what the Ambassador said.

Mr. President, I continue to read from the note which was sent to the Secretary of State 3 weeks after the Public Works Committee got the bill:

Navigation and commercial interests depend upon the maintenance of the basis upon which channel enlargements have been designed in order that vessels of deep draft may proceed with full load to and from the ports of the Upper Great Lakes. In this connection I would refer to the following matters:

(a) The construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Legislation in the two countries and the several exchanges of notes concerning the construction and operation of the seaway now just completed are based on the assumption and undertsanding that there will not be unilateral action repugnant to the purposes of the legislation. Withdrawal of water from the Great Lakes Basin would materially affect the operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway;

I think that has been demonstrated on the floor beyond the slightest doubt. The Senators from New York showed what would be the effect on the development of water power. We shall show, before we are through, what will be the effect and what is the effect upon the Great Lakes ports and upon navigation. That has been stressed fully, but it is a question of injury which the Senators have not thought about in regard to the bill.

Mr. President, Canada and America have put a billion dollars into the St. Lawrence Seaway, to make it the fourth coast in America. Yes, we have sought to make it a place where we can live and develop and grow. Shortly there will be 100 million people in that basin. Now we are talking about making it possible for one city to lay a precedent by action of Congress. Then there will be countless bills presented to Congress, from other cities. Think what logrolling there will be—"Yes; I voted for your bill; now you vote for mine." What a brilliant prospect that is. What a wonderful thing to look forward to. We do not have enough to tend to without creating another "open sore," so to speak, in legislation.

Mr. President, I continue the quotation:

Withdrawal of water from the Great Lakes Basin would materially affect the operation of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

The Canadian Ambassador said that. Really, there has been no proof to the contrary on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I continue to read:

(b) Dredging. By agreement contained in the various exchanges of notes between the two countries, profiles have been prepared for the excavation which has taken place or is about to take place in the International Rapids section of the river, in the Amherstburg Channel and in the St. Clair River.

I presume the word "profile" means the same as "plans."

These agreements are based on the implied understanding that material changes would not be made in the volume of water available for navigation.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I must insist upon orderly procedure of the Senate. The Senator may yield for a question but not for an insertion in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING. I asked the Senator to yield for a question.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, now that the Senator from Illinois has been so gracious and at long last has melted, I hope if I yield for the question that the question will follow in the proper context of what I am saying. If it relates to this matter I ask that it follow in order. I trust that my yielding will not interfere in the slightest degree with my right to pursue this course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the inquiry I want to address to the Senator from Wisconsin, who is making such a valiant fight and such an excellent argument, is this: Has the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin heard on the floor any effective response to the argument relating to the damage to our international relations which passage of the bill would cause? Has that question been answered by any Senator on the floor?

Mr. WILEY. I think I have been on the floor all the time, except perhaps for a little "breathing spell," we might say, when I have stepped out. I have heard no answer. The answer to the Senator's question is, "No."

Mr. KEATING. Does not the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin feel that is certainly one of the major implications of this proposed legislation?

Mr. WILEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the Senator feel it deserves some reply from those who are advancing the need for the proposed legislation?

Mr. WILEY. I presume we will hear an argument on that at the proper time. I will say that in spite of the statement of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who constantly says there is a filibuster—of course, the Senator from New York had better look out, or he will be accused of filibustering, too——

Mr. KEATING. I have been.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator from Illinois has been doing a pretty good job himself in making a contribution to the continuity of the matter so far. But I have not heard anything, in response to the question.

Mr. KEATING. I thank my colleague.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield on the same point?

Mr. WILEY. If I may yield for a question without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Wisconsin yields to the junior Senator from Wisconsin for a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that if the opponents of H.R. 1 desire to engage in a filibuster, what they would do would be to constantly suggest the absence of a quorum? Is it not true that by doing this a great deal of time could easily be consumed with very little, almost no, effort on the part of the opponents of the bill? Is it not true that we could do this over and over again? Is it not true that often in the past when opponents of a bill have wished to prevent a vote, they have resorted to this device, and is it not also true that the opponents of H.R. 1 have suggested almost no absences of a quorum?

And may I ask this concluding question? Is it not true that today we have not had a single quorum call, although it is 2½ hours since the Senate convened? I think this is the first time since the Senate has met this year that the Senate has gone for 2½ hours without a quorum call. Is it not also true that the reason we have not suggested the absence of a quorum is because we are very anxious to get the merits of this bill before the Senate and before the country?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, that is correct, and I must say, in commenting on the answer, that I am sure my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin is well versed in what constitutes a filibuster, because he sat at the feet of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for another question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield under the same conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Wisconsin yields to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Has the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin been called to an excellent editorial in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald in which the distinction is drawn between debate to furnish information and greater knowledge, deeper knowledge, to the Members of the Senate, and what could be termed a filibuster, in which the editors reach the justified conclusion that this debate has been on the subject all the way through, and has been conducted in order that the Members of the Senate might have greater knowledge, with the probability that if they are given the opportunity to vote again, as I hope the Senator will give them, and I am sure he will, they will say that the international ramifications of this bill are so important that it should be considered by the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. WILEY. I must say to the distinguished Senator from New York that I read the editorial, and I immediately prescribed it for the consideration of the Senator from Illinois, but he, being so filibuster-minded himself, could not see the point. I feel that the editorial itself takes the Senator from Illinois for a nice little ride.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to be sure that my colleague from Illinois hears this. Would the Senator yield for the purpose of a unanimous-consent request to place in the RECORD this editorial?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must reluctantly object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I thank all three—what shall I say?—battlers.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. WILEY. On the same conditions.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator be interested in knowing that his junior colleague has tremendous admiration for the very competent job the senior Senator from Wisconsin has been doing on this issue of whether or not this bill should be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. WILEY. I thank my colleague.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Would the Senator be interested in knowing, further, that I have carefully read his brief, and that I, of course, earnestly hope that all other Senators will read it? Would the Senator be interested in knowing, further, that the junior Senator from Wisconsin feels that it would be very difficult for any Senator carefully and thoughtfully to read this brief and then vote against referring this bill to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Would the Senator be interested in knowing, further, that in the judgment of the junior Senator from Wisconsin it is very masterful, competent job?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I thank my colleague. You know, at my age what one likes more than appreciation is more appreciation. So I am very grateful, I assure the Senator.

I shall now continue my discussion of this very, very important phase of what I consider is probably the main issue. It is a bigger issue than the issue between the five States and Chicago. This issue is the question of maintaining friendly relations, giving heed to the expressions of the leaders of the friendly nation to the north on a subject that relates fundamentally to the matter of whether we will become treatybreakers, whether we will become breakers of agreements, whether we will do that which will be detrimental to the St. Lawrence Waterway, on which we and Canada have spent a billion dollars.

That is a great moral issue, but more than that, it involves a great legal issue. It involves breaking a precedent of 175 years in which we have been a Nation, and I submit, Mr. President, that as far as I am concerned, if we should fail in having the bill sent to the Foreign Relations Committee, though I do not think we will, we will talk here until, as the fellow says, "Hell freezes over," as far as I am concerned.

No, I am trying to use a common phrase, one that is, let us say, very informative. It is not one that is used carelessly. It is an expression that expresses in no uncertain terms the determination of all of us that America shall not start in breaking the commandments, the commandments that have made international policy so firm between us and our allies. I do not have to say anything further on that subject except to say, as I repeated, and I of course shall repeat again.

Am I getting a real smile from my associate from Illinois? There is not much between us except a line, you know, across the State, but we are awfully glad that we lost Chicago some 75 or 80 years ago, whenever it was the Government took that area off of the Wisconsin Territory.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. I yield, subject to the usual conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin yields to the Senator from New York for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Has the Senator noticed that when the Senator from Wisconsin and the junior Senator from New York engage in a colloquy, the distinguished Senator from Illinois moves over closer with apparently a suspicion that there might be something sinister or untoward in our actions?

Mr. WILEY. Oh, no, no. I cannot agree to that. I think he just has a liking for me. That is all.

Mr. KEATING. That may be it.

Mr. WILEY. So I am glad to see him becoming closer and closer here to distinguished Senators.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Subject to the conditions that I not lose the floor, I will yield for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin yields to the Senator from Arkansas for a question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to ask if I may insert something in the RECORD.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I must object.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I was asking a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois object to an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois objects. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Subject to the usual conditions.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Does it not strike the senior Senator from Wisconsin as unusual that the close friendship of the Senator from Illinois for the Senator from Arkansas, which was so apparent yesterday and which was so striking, has now apparently deteriorated to such a point that now the Senator from Illinois will not make an exception for his firm and good friend from Arkansas?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I would not go that far. I will just say that the Senator from Illinois is getting a little weak and tired and wants this matter to close.

Mr. KEATING. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILEY. Under the conditions I have heretofore stated, yes.

Mr. KEATING. Does the Senator realize that, despite objections made by the Senator from Illinois to certain unanimous-consent requests of mine, I bear no ill will toward him?

Mr. WILEY. That is one of the remarkable things about being a Senator. As I stated earlier, in speaking about a Senator's obligation, I never criticize a Senator because he disagrees with me. All I ask is that a Senator not give snap judgment when he has not gone into the record. That is why I have caused to be placed on the desks of Senators copies of a brief which I presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which has in it excerpts from the debates in the Canadian Parliament, the purpose being to throw light on a very misty subject, which started out being misty, first, because of the attitude of the two distinguished Senators from Illinois. I see the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] approaching with a smile on his countenance.

Second, there is the influence of the O'Brien group in the House. They have had exceedingly great influence here. It is my object, of course, to clear away the mist if I can, by bringing out the facts, and by logic, as well as by the contentions not only of the present Prime Minister of Canada, but the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, as well as of Mr. Herrid, a Member of the Canadian Parliament, who said:

> We in this group hope that the Congress of the United States will pay attention to this day's proceedings and note from the proceedings that Parliament in this respect is unanimous.

I shall continue reading from the note which I started to read. The last thing I spoke about was the new channel, with respect to which it was said that there was an exchange of notes on February 28, 1959:

> (c) New channel. In an exchange of notes dated February 28, 1959, it has been agreed that a new channel should be constructed to eliminate the so-called southeast bend of the St. Clair River—

This is the important thing. This is from the Prime Minister of Canada—

> The agreement by the Government of Canada to this proposal was based on the understanding that there would be no artificial interference with the present supplies of water.

"No artificial interference with the present supplies of water." What is it Chicago wants? First, she has 3,200 or 3,300 cubic feet, which was allowed by the Court. Now she wants the Congress of the United States to give her another thousand cubic feet. We have already had plenty of evidence as to what the influence of a thousand cubic feet would be, and what the meaning of a thousand cubic feet per second is—not per minute, not per year, not for 24 hours, but for 365 days in the year, a thousand cubic feet every second. It amounts to more than a thousand billion gallons off the surface of that lake. It is said that that does not amount to anything. We shall see about that.

I continue reading:

> Because of the importance attached by the United States of America and Canada to the honoring of international undertakings in letter and in spirit, the Government of Canada views with serious concern any possible impairment of agreements and undertakings relating to the Great Lakes Basin.

Canada "views with serious concern." Can we not "view with serious concern" when a great sister nation speaks to us about a situation? Can we not think this problem through, as unbiased, unprejudiced, untied individuals, as Senators who want to find a solution?

How can a solution be found? It can be found by referring this question to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Why? First, because it relates to treaties with our best friend, Canada. Second, it relates to understandings with and commitments to our best friend, Canada. Yet we are asked to ignore them.

I read further from the parliamentary debates:

> Furthermore, the alarms created by repeated proposals for diversion which inevitably disturb the people and industry of Canada are a source of profound irritation to the relations between our two countries which we can ill afford.

Could any language be clearer? They are talking about a source of profound irritation to the relations between the two countries. The argument is so profound that we shall be here for a long time, if necessary. A great principle is involved. Can we afford to break treaties? Can we put ourselves in the same class with Khrushchev? Can we become what other names infamous in history became because they would not keep treaties? The answer is "No." For me and my children the answer will be "No" for a long, long time.
